The Fur and Leather School, at 153 West Thirteenth Street, is the place owned by an official at the Washington office of the United States Veterans' Bureau. He is Herbert Blair, a "training officer" in the rehabilitation division of the bureau, at present touring New York and Boston, inspecting and studying trade-training institutions. His salary is about $3,000 a year, and according to Personnel Chief Longfellow, he has been on and off the bureau pay rolls since 1918.

Records show that Blair was employed at the New York office of the Veterans' Bureau in 1918 at a salary of $4,000 a year as vocational officer. For a short time thereafter his pay was reduced to $2,500, and on July 1, 1920, he became a $1 a year man as a counselor. He had a short leave of absence with pay from November 17, 1919, to December 31, 1919, apparently to give him time to organize his school. He had another leave—this time without pay—between January 1, 1920, and June 30 of the same year.

On November 14, 1922, he was appointed a "training officer" by the Washington headquarters, which position he now holds. He is at this moment stationed at 563 Massachusetts Avenue, Boston.

GETS ADDITIONAL PAY FOR TRAINING OF SOLDIERS.

Blair, while a vocational officer in the bureau, opened his fur and leather school in Thirteenth Street in November, 1919. It is in operation at this writing. His contract with the Government calls for the payment to him of $50 per trainee per month for the first six months of instruction and $25 per trainee per month for the next six months. The school supplies its own materials.

I am told there were never less than 35 to 40 students in the place since its inception, so that its director has been receiving the tidy sum of about $20,000 a year, in addition to his compensation as a Government official.

The institution is an old two-story brick affair, which the men call a fire trap. Upon my visit a week ago there were only two instructors, one for the leather workers and one for the fur workers. The man in charge was Irving W. Foltz, who later told me that he was merely acting for Mr. Blair; that the latter was the director. Foltz also said that Blair "was connected with the Government and that he was investigating the Veterans' Bureau for the Veterans' Bureau." There were 34 men in the school at the time.

What goes on there? Here is Genaro Deputso, of 107 Ditmas Avenue, Brooklyn. He has bad feet. They were frozen overseas and they are now unmanageable and painful.

"I've been here four months in this fur school," he says, "and I only had two little bits of work to do. Eh, it's a rotten place, and why did they put me here? Look at my feet. The machines, you know, upstairs, which sew the pieces of fur together, are worked with the feet. What can I do? But they think it's all right. There are a lot of fellows upstairs in my position. They have been trying to get changed to other work, but nothing doing.

"What are they going to do with us, anyhow? Even if I had feet to work with, it wouldn't do no good. Furs! Huh, it's funny! There's a few rabbit skins been lying around which the men have been tearing apart and sewing together, tearing apart and sewing together, day in and day out, for weeks and months, and that's all we get to know about the fur business.

"Oh, yes; a few months ago they did bring some coats of some kind to work on. It was an outside job, and the fellows who had been there for a long time couldn't even tell what kind of a fur it was. Well, anyhow, there was some fussing around with them, and whatever work was done on them the school people must have got the money for.

"And, then, what good is it anyhow? The season for fur workers only lasts for 3 or 4 months of the year, and if a man sticks in the trade for 20 years, maybe he can make $50 a week. But we ain't taught the fur business! We couldn't make $10 a week even 3 months a year.

"Would you believe it, an adviser at the Veterans' Bureau put me first in auto mechanics, and with my punk legs, mind you. Then it sort of struck somebody funny, and they put me in mechanical optics. I spent months and months in both trades and learned nothing—nothing. Then I came here. They saw my legs, and they knew what I had to do in furs, but they sent me here just the same.

"My period of training is supposed to be over this coming September. I don't know any trade and I don't know what is going to happen to me. I heard they were going to put me at shoemaking for awhile. But I was a first-class barber before the war. Do you think I will take such a thing as a shoemaker?"

Let G—— E——, who feared the use of his name might involve him in some difficulty, cast a little more light on the institution. E—— lives in Brooklyn. His feet have been operated upon so frequently, he said, that he has lost count of the number of times. He can scarcely stand up with the aid of an oaken stick.

SAYS BUREAU JUST WANTS TO GET MEN OFF THEIR HANDS.

"Yes, I'm in the fur school, too," he volunteered. "Bad feet? Well, I guess that don't make any difference to the bureau. They just want to get you off their hands. How can I touch a machine with my feet? I don't touch them, and I'm not getting anywhere. I'd be satisfied if they got me a news stand some place, just the place, you know. Sure, they must know I can't work a fur machine with these feet. I've been here nearly a year, I guess, and I certainly don't know what it's all about yet. My period is going to be over soon. I guess I'll land in a hospital.

"This fur school is a dumping ground, anyhow. When an adviser or training officer has to think a little about what he is going to do with you he thinks of shoemaking, tailoring, and then fur making That's a fact. Go upstairs yourself and see how many men with bad feet are supposed to be working fur machines. Besides, some of the fellows got bad eyes. How they ever expect to learn anything in the fur trade I don't know. They're all disgusted with it and say the place ought to be closed up. On the level, Jack, it's next door to nothing.

"It's just as bad in the leather room. The fellows just got through working on an outside job, but the fellows got no money. And it wasn't such fancy work, either. They just did a little clipping on a bunch of pocketbooks. That's about as much as they learn in the leather room. Hasn't anything ever been said about this school before? Why, the fellows knew it all along.

"But you know how it is. A lot of the men are helpless, many of them are married and have children like me, and they depend on that $100 a month for support, and they're afraid if they kick they will be thrown out of training altogether and their support stopped. It's happened lots of times.

ONLY 5 PER CENT WILL BE ABLE TO GET JOB IN TRADE.

"Now, take those 30 men in this school. I know for a fact that not more than 5, or 10 at the most, will ever be able to get a job worth talking about in these trades. In the first place, a lot of the men can't do the work because of their injuries. In the second place, they aren't taught the trade in any way; and, in the third place, the unions are hard and won't let the men in, and you know what kind of a stiff union the fur workers have. And one of the great troubles is that Government advisers never tell us about this union stonewall we are going to run up against in this industry. That's a little surprise they hold out on us. What are we going to do? I don't know."

I approached another of the men named C——

"Are you really learning anything about the fur trade?" I asked.

"Only what my eyes can teach me," he replied. "You can see for yourself what I can do with these pretty feet. And besides it's rabbit skins, rabbit skins. Who says anything about fur?"

"But you are supposed to get instruction in combing, curing, and all the other processes involved in preparing furs for the market. The Government, I think, is paying the school $50 every month for each of you fellows on the ground that the materials you work with cost so much," I remarked.

"Supposed, supposed, that's another thing you want to be careful of. I was supposed to be a dental mechanic, but just like that, they turned me into a fur worker. You know, everybody starts as a dental mechanic. God, if they all turned out dental mechanics who started in it we'd have more people making molars than there are false teeth in the United States! That's no joke. There's Eppy. Ask Eppy. He's been through it."

And so the stories here ran. A few of the men told me that they really wanted to learn the trade, that they had families to provide for, and that they realized they had to find a way to earn their bread and butter at the expiration of their training period.

The usual complaint, however, was that they had been repeatedly misadvised as to the type of vocational training they were to or could pursue; that they had been shifted thoughtlessly from one trade to another, and then after wasting, literally, years were finally dumped into this and other work places despite their obvious inability to work in these industries.

"There used to be two men here teaching English to the boys who couldn't understand what was going on," broke in Deputso in the course of a discussion. "Maybe they got wise that we were learning something. They don't even give us this now. At least some of the men with bad feet could pick up something with their ears. But the teachers have gone away and we haven't had the course in two or three months."

"Do you think you can do anything for us?" Deputso finally pleaded. "You know. You are real fellows. We don't want charity, but we want to be able to turn a nickel for ourselves, and hold our heads right when we are turned loose. It's coming soon. See what you can do."

BROKEN WAR VETERANS BEG FOR JUSTICE—MEN WITH BATTERED BACKS, BRACED ARMS, STIFFENED FINGERS SENT TO SCHOOL TO LEARN MECHANICS—TEACHER GETS $40 MONTH A STUDENT—MERE YOUTH, CALLED "BUSY KID," IN CHARGE—ONLY THREE LATHES FOR 80 TO OPERATE.

"Gad, it's a mighty twinge the old leg gives me every now and then. The Boche bullet sure did muss up this right foot of mine. I can hardly stand up more than two or three minutes at a time. Huh! It's funny. Here I am with a punk leg and my lungs on the blink, and I ought to be outdoors on some light kind of work or something, and they're trying to make an expert mechanic out of me, just like that."

Richard Grogan was telling me of his troubles and those of his veteran associates at the Holmes Vocational School, 649 Broadway, where the Government has placed 80 disabled soldiers for training in mechanics and sheet-metal work. The institution occupies the fifth floor of a loft building, and is headed by Lawrence Holmes, a mere youth in apeparance, who is referred to by the trainees as "the busy kid" from his generally hurried manner.

MICAWBER AIR IN SCHOOL.

The school has a Micawber air about it, the men standing leisurely about as though expecting something. They had a queer way of greeting each other with, "Anybody hurt? Anybody hurt?" interspersed with the question, "Did it come? Did it come?" the significance of which I learned a little later.

Holmes opened his place in July, 1921, his contract with the Government providing that he be paid $40 a month for each man sent to the school by the Veterans' Bureau for training. A large section of the school floor is taken up with an elaborately furnished office, with comptometers, cash registers, and other devices for keeping record of apparently flourishing incoming and outgoing accounts.

Behind the office were a few miniature so-called classrooms and then came the training shop. There were a couple of rows of machines and two belts were working. The students were just standing idly about in their hats, white collars, and coats.

NOT LEARNING A THING.

"The place is a circus," Grogan began to tell me, "and when it's not a circus it's just a hang out. We're not learning a thing. How can we Look at me, for instance. I've been here a year and a half. My foot is bunged up and my lungs were gassed. I ought to be out doors, but they keep me here. I've asked to be transferred a thousand times. I'll never be a mechanic. The work is too hard; that is, when you're learning real mechanics. But the advisor at the Veterans' Bureau says, 'You be a mechanic,' and here I am. It's a waste of time. I don't know what I'm going to do. I haven't learned anything, and the period of my training is nearly over, and in a few months they're going to turn me loose as an expert mechanic. But there are a lot of fellows here in my boots."

Here he pointed out a score of men who had one bodily disability or another which it was obvious precluded every possibility of their ever being able to succeed in the trade in which they were expected in a short time to earn a livelihood. There was one with a braced arm with which it was evident he certainly could not handle tools. Another had stiffened fingers, another a battered back, and so on. I counted 15 of these unfortunates.

"How did these fellows ever come to this place?" I asked Grogan. "Why are they permitted to remain here?"

ORDERED TO BE MECHANIC.

"The fellows ask themselves that question in their sleep," Grogan replied. "In the first place, the adviser or training officer at the Veterans' Bureau headquarters simply ordered them to come here and said, "You'll be a mechanic." The soldier shows his broken hand and says, "What, with this hand?" but the adviser says, "You'll be a mechanic or nothing."

"Well, you know a lot of these fellows are married and have children and are helpless and need the $100 or $135 a month that the Government gives us while we are in training. And that's the answer why a lot of us are here. Of course, we want to learn something. We'd like to learn some kind of trade, but we're not miracle workers.

"Let me tell you, the people that sent us here have either ivory heads or shrewd ones. But it certainly is tough on us. It's wrecking a lot of lives. Something ought to be done about it. What am I going to do? I don't know. We'll turn out a fine bunch of panhandlers. There's at least 15 fellows in here that's got bum arms or hands or something and never will turn a wheel or handle a hammer. Then there are about 15 more who never wanted to be mechanics, who don't take any interest in it, aren't learning anything about it, and are just wasting their time here."

PLEADS TO BE TAKEN AWAY.

"These fellows," continued Grogan, "have pleaded and pleaded to be taken away from here and transferred to something they can do. We've got grievance committees up and done a lot of talking, but the training officer says the matter is being considered and things like that, and months go by and years, and we're here."

"But isn't the head of the school or the instructor supposed to recommend your transfer from here when he finds a veteran is not making any progress or can't perform the duties of the trade?" I asked.

"Yes, he's supposed to, but I guess they have reasons for wanting to keep us here. The head of the school gets $40 a man a month from the Government, and he certainly should like to keep as many men here as he can. Don't you see the point? But the Government inspectors oughtn't to let anything like this go on. It's human lives and careers they are dealing with. For God's sake, we managed to come out of the war alive. Now, well, it's no use kicking, but if they are trying to do something for us this dump ought to be put out of business."

With the help of Grogan and a few trainees I took stock of the place. There were only four engine lathes available for the entire student body. There were three Miller machines, but only one doing accurate work. The bench lathes could be used for only the most elementary work.

NOT ENOUGH MACHINES.

"Why, I haven't been on an engine lathe since last August. There isn't enough machines for half the men," insisted Grogan. "Here, ask Loccari, there, what the instructor told him when he complained he couldn't get a machine."

Loccari told me he hadn't been near a machine for three months. Once, he said, he became desperate and thought he ought to know just a little bit and demanded he be given a machine. "Why, grab one, grab one!" he said the instructor told him. "Why, the fellows sleep here all night so they'll have the machines in the morning."

"Can you beat it?" broke in Grogan. "They tell use to fight for the machines. Well, we have a little joke about it, and that's what the fellows mean when you hear them say, 'Anybody hurt? Anybody hurt?'"

Six months ago the veterans were told new machines were on the way "any day." "Any day" has never come, and that's the source of another little joke of theirs, the "Did they come?" question which they use with guffaws on all occasions.

LESSONS IN ENGLISH.

I was informed that the instructors in the place are hard put to it to occupy the idle time of the trainees, and take up all of Wednesday and Thursday in the miniature classrooms, seating possibly 15 men, with lessons in English, drawing, geometry, trigonometry, logarithims, and mathematics.

"But that's another funny thing," broke in Grogan, in reply to a question, "there isn't 3 fellows in the whole school of 80 who knows anything about those things, and you know that they are important in tool and die making. Of course, these men aren't prepared for it, yet an adviser thought it was all right, and the teachers just go through it like a machine. Nobody gets anything—and there you are."

Grogan called over a number of his associates to testify that there were only two instructors actually available for machine-shop instruction, and that these did little to help the trainees learn even the most elementary things. There were two instructors used in classroom work, they explained, and the best machine-shop man was used for the personal service of Holmes himself.

USE THEIR OWN JUDGMENT.

"And in drawing," one of the veterans broke in, "they just tell you to use your own judgment. We come here to learn, mind you, and they tell us to use our own judgment. Here's Wiener. He'll tell you a thing or two."

Joseph Wiener has been in the school since March 1, 1922, having come from a defunct institution called Lincoln Institute, where several hundred veterans lost two years of valuable time learning nothing.

"I've been here nearly a year now," said Wiener, "and they told me I would be turned loose as an expert machinist in November of 1923. Ha, it's funnier than a joke! Why, I don't know any more about mechanics than when I first came here, and it isn't my fault, either. I know I won't be able to earn $10 a week at the trade. They didn't tell us anything about the union business, either. You know the union won't take us trainees in because they say we don't get any instruction. The whole thing is a rotten, botched-up affair, and we men are the sufferers."

EYES AND LUNGS AFFECTED.

Wiener has a wife and child. He was a polisher before the war. His eyes are bad, and his lungs have been affected by his war service. "Why, I can't even see a micrometer, you know, to measure things with, and yet they think I'll make a mechanic. I've asked to be transferred, but that's as far as it goes. I'm not the only one. Why, a dozen fellows in this place can't do the work. There are men with tuberculosis in here. Why do they keep fellows like us, who will never be mechanics, here? It ain't fair. We ought to get an even break."

Wiener expressed the opinion that not 30 out of the entire 80 students in the school are learning even the most elementary things about mechanics because of the lack of facilities or the physical inability of the men to continue with the trade.

Another thing that interfered with the training of the men here, I was told, was the custom of the school authorities of bringing outside work into the institution and importing expert mechanics to do the job on the machines that should be used solely for the instruction of the trainees.

NOT AVAILABLE FOR STUDENTS.

I was told of two such contracts, the last of which was for the construction of some radio outfits, which, I was told, occupied the better part of three months—June, July, and August—during which time the machines were not available to the veterans. A few, it was said, were permitted to act as helpers and were set to drilling holes for weeks at a time in pieces of metal.

There was the case of Edward Comery, which was familiar to every soldier in the place. Comery was a truckman before the war, but a German bullet tore up his right arm and stiffened his fingers. When he was told the Government was going to give him an opportunity to learn a trade he told his friends that, "By Jove, the war had done him some good, anyhow."

He was sent to the Holmes School for sheet-metal work or mechanics. "I showed an adviser my fingers. He certainly saw I couldn't bend them," he said, "but here I am." He knows he will never be a mechanic. He has asked to be transferred. A training officer cut him off. Now, he has been told it is too late. He has six or seven months to go before the expiration of his training period, and then he expects to be turned out as a mechanic, with nothing but the label to indicate his connection with the trade.

Locarri, a little fellow with a gay face, shrugged his shoulders when I asked just how much instruction he received. "Well, personally I haven't been on a machine for three or four months. But when we get a machine by grabbing it, just as we are told to do, and staying up all night, then we don't have any tools, and when we have tools we don't have the machines—and that's what we learn about mechanics. You'll find some fellows who want to stay here. They think it's a cinch. They're lazy and don't care whether they learn or not, and say, 'Leave things alone and don't kick.' But it's a disgrace, and I don't know why they make us waste our time here. We'll be dumped into the street. What Grogan said is right. We'll be lucky if we learn to drive a nail straight."

And so the stories of discouragement and hopelessness ran seemingly without end. Here was a veteran whose body had been wasted by sickness—"Poor Jo Frick" they called him. He couldn't by the wildest stretch of the imagination ever perform the duties that mechanics are called upon to do. He has been asked to be readvised into some other occupation more in keeping with his physical condition. Months have gone by and "Jo" still is hanging around the place. And there were many others to whom I spoke and whose tales were in the same strain.

"Why do they keep us here doing nothing? Why do they keep us here doing nothing?" was the usual plaint.

Upon leaving the place I observed a list of names written in a large, florid hand posted up near the exit. It was headed "Roll of Honor." I asked one of the trainees what the special service was that these men had been honored for. "What are you doing, kidding?" he smiled. "That's only a list of the names of the trainees in the school. Oh, we get a lot of honor all right. But—well, you saw the place. That's all."

UNION RULES BAR DOORS TO WAR CRIPPLES—POORLY TRAINED VETERANS, REFUSED MEMBERSHIP, MUST TAKE MEAN JOBS AT STARVATION WAGES—FOUR-YEAR "SCHOOLING" PROVES VALUELESS—HALF-BLIND MEN "TAUGHT" WATCHMAKING WHILE MAIMED LEARN PAINTING.

The troubles of the disabled veterans who have been misadvised by Government officials and placed for training in vocations in which they can not possibly succeed because of their infirmities are obvious and numerous enough. If, in addition, they have been placed in institutions—as hundreds of them have—where the instruction offered is but a pretense, their chances of being restored to a gainful occupation are virtually nil.

There are some schools, however, where a sincere effort is made to give the soldiers the rudiments of craftsmanship. Here, however, appears a new difficulty and one that is vital to every veteran receiving institutional training under Government direction.

It is the labor union.

Nearly all of the one hundred and seventy odd trades, which the men are being taught in 90 schools of the city, are thoroughly unionized. In many instances the labor organizations dominate the industry.

NO ENTRY FOR VETERAN.

For one reason or another they have in the main closed their doors to the rehabilitated veteran. The two, three, or four years' training the disabled man has received under the wing of the Federal Government is accounted of little value. His admission to this union or that is barred on the ground of inadequate training and apprenticeship, and the only employment opportunities left open to him are a few stray, low-paying, nonunion jobs.

Of this almost insurmountable barrier the veteran learns only on the eve of his discharge from training. Nothing, apparently, is told him of the problem at the time he is assigned to a trade. It seems to have been either entirely overlooked or given slight consideration by the Federal agencies charged with the responsibility of salvaging the broken soldier. Hundreds of men have been and are still being crowded into industries where the hold of the unions is indusputable, where their regulations are iron-bound and forbidding, where admission tests are of the strictest nature, and where the doors are practically closed to the veteran until he has served a long term of practical apprenticeship, as much as five years.

It is the stone wall toward which the great body of the 8,000 trainees in this city are heading.

"What is the use of all this training, anyhow," asked a veteran, "when the unions refuse to take us in at the end of our courses of instruction? They put us through severe tests, and if we have been assigned to an inefficient school or the course of training has been short, as it is in many of the trades, we fail. Few, if any, get in. It means that we must enter these trades as new men with apprentice wages. The two, three, or four years that the Government has put on us is wasted. Of course, there are a few nonunion jobs, but they're only a few, and pay low wages. It's a rotten situation."

The veterans, however, have only recently realized the seriousness of the union difficulties awaiting them at the expiration of their training time. At present they have no delusions about the matter and are hopeless enough about the outlook. There have been some meetings of committees with the labor men, but nothing definite has been accomplished. There has been no stirring of a finger, however, on the part of past Veterans' Bureau officials. What the present administration will do is problematical. There is no doubt that it should do something, and that quickly.

This phase of the rehabilitation muddle was most strikingly brought home to me on a visit to the branch of the College of the City of New York, at One hundred and fiftieth Street and Amsterdam Avenue, where there are about 500 disabled men under instruction in a dozen industries. Here were scores of men who had spent years in training in other institutions, who had been transferred to this school; and continued their instruction in sign painting, plumbing, printing (at the Lexington Avenue branch), and similar vocations, and who at the expiration of their period of training will find the doors of profitable employment closed to them, and their several years of preparation wasted.

What is to become of these men? How are they going to be rehabilitated in these trades? The unions say they can't possibly admit them on an equal basis because their training is inadequate and the small period of "placement" work, as the extra time allowed the veterans for practical experience at the end of their schooling is called, is all too small.

BEST TRAINING TOO HURRIED.

Perhaps there is some truth in the union contentions, but that, of course, does not mitigate the unfortunate predicament of the disabled veterans. Let us take a look at some of the courses at the City College branch. This school is conceded to be the best in the metropolitan area. The instructors are earnest, the facilities are fairly adequate, and a genuine effort is made to turn out good craftsmen in carpentry, cabinetmaking, shoe repairing, storage-battery work, plumbing, mechanical dentistry, tailoring, watchmaking, and a few other trades.

But here, as in other institutions, attempts are being made to turn out fine cabinetmakers in one and a half years, with a short period of placement training. Watchmakers are breathlessly developed in two and a half years, pressmen in 18 months, compositors in two years, and so on.

In all these trades the necessity for long periods of practical training is generally recognized. I have been informed by a watchmaker that good men in this industry must spend between 5 and 10 years in close application. In the printing industry the unions require an apprenticeship of five years. As for cabinetmaking, at its best really an art, I was told that those now assigned to and being trained in the course at City College couldn't learn it in 20 years.

TRADE ALREADY CROWDED.

Then there is the situation in the sign-painting class. There are altogether 800 union sign painters struggling to eke out a tolerable existence in this city. While there are but 35 or 40 men in this course at City College, more than 400 veterans have been crowded into this trade and are shortly to be rehabilitated in it. The union men say there isn't enough work now in the city for those already in the industry. They require a five-year apprenticeship for admission to their organization, and have so far declined to receive trainees who have not fulfilled this requirement.

The end of the training period of these sign-painting and show-card-writing soldiers is not far distant. What is going to happen when they are discharged? Where are they going to find work? Why were so many of them advised to take up this trade?

In this, as in nearly every other branch of training, we find misfits of all kinds. It appears to be no fault of the instructors in this particular school that men physically unable to go through even the motions of sign painting are retained in the class. They have repeatedly recommended their transfer, but no attention, it seems, is paid to their requests.

And so these soldiers are virtually forced to waste time, and soon their training period will be over, and although they have never touched brush or pencil to cardboard, they will be rehabilitated as "sign painters."

MOST OF CLASS MISFITS.

I was told that 30 out of an entire class of 40 in sign painting here should properly be readvised.

There is Isadore Mairowitz, for instance, a thin little fellow of 28, with a wife and two children. Mairowitz "got his" at Soissons, a bullet shattering his left hand, leaving three fingers limp. He was a tailor before the war. An adviser back in December, 1920, sent him to the defunct Lincoln Institute, with the request that he "be given something to do."

"They put me at sign painting," said Mairowitz, telling his story. "I told them it was a joke. How could I paint with my paralyzed hand? I asked to be transferred, but they kept me there until March, 1922, when the place was closed up, and then I was transferred to the East Side Y. M. C. A. Then, in July of 1922, I was sent here—all the time in sign painting.

"The instructors in the college know I can't do anything. I haven't learned a thing. It's a damn shame, because I would like to learn something so I could support myself and my family. They have written notes and everything to headquarters, and they don't even get an answer. Will you tell me why they keep a fellow like me here? I can't even hold a maulstick. What do you think is going to happen to me when I get out?

"PAINTER" WITH BROKEN HAND.

Then here is the strange tale of Nathan Tare, who also had his left hand ripped up in France. They at first placed him in electric repair work, which was bad enough for his left hand, he said, and after wasting six months they sent him to Lincoln Institute, where he remained for a year doing nothing.

"I told them I wanted something useful to do," Tare said, "something that I could do and was fitted for. I thought poultry raising was all right and they agreed. They sent me up to Bronx Park apparently for instruction in poultry raising. I was there for six months and the only thing I was permitted to do was plant seeds. I never saw a chicken or any kind of a fowl in all that time. I kicked about it and they put me on a farm, but only let me stay there for a month.

"I don't know what it was all about, but suddenly they ordered me into auto repairing at the East Side Vulcanizing Co. Six months there knocked the stuffings out of my health, and then there was my bad hand. The doctor had me taken out of the place and here I am at sign painting, of all the things in the world. You can see for yourself how much sign painting I can do with this hand. I'm a good fighter. I was a pugilist before the war and made good money at it, but I'm no magician. Do you think they're going to keep us fellows stringing long this way without giving us a chance to do something we can do?"

The instructors in the school recommended Tare's transfer last November, but he is still "sign painting."

NO CHANCE TO REBEL.

The situation in the other classes and courses is about the same. Large numbers of men have physical disabilities of such a nature as to prevent their ever mastering the trades and making a living at it, but nevertheless are forced to continue aimlessly in the courses because they are helpless and need the $100 a month which the Government allows them during the training period.

Samuel Berger, of 234 Moore Street, Brooklyn, is "just hanging around in the tailoring class," he says, because of a shattered wrist suffered in the Argonne. "See, it's the right wrist," he said, "and I can't do a thing with it, but they've had me doing sign painting. They must have a good laugh at that, and when they had enough, after about a year, they tried another little joke and put me at tailoring in this college. I can't thread a needle even, and they say, 'You be a tailor or nothing.' For two months I've just been coming here and going home. The instructor has recommended me for readvisement, but that's as far as it has gone. I guess they'll soon have the nerve to give me papers and say I've been restored to usefulness as a fine tailor. You'll see."

Berger has a wife and child.

Andrew Ermak was a fireman before the war, with a home at 149 Clinton Avenue, Maspeth, L. I. Ermak also has a wife and child. His health had been shot to pieces at Chateau-Thierry and he was hit by gas clouds in the Argonne and St. Mihiel. His eyes tear, he has chronic bronchitis, and his lungs are not too good. In 1921 he was placed at carpentry training and then switched to watchmaking.

PROTEST PROVES OF NO AVAIL.

"I've been here since last September in the watchmaking class," Ermak said. "First of all, I'm too nervous for that kind of work. Then my eyes are bad and the strain makes them worse. To tell you the truth, I am not doing a thing in the trade and I'm not getting anywhere. How can they expect me with bad eyes to be a watchmaker? Why, it's foolish. But it's a waste of time. I can't understand their object in keeping me in this kind of training. Yes, the college people have been trying to get me out of here. But there are dozens of other cases and nothing ever happens. It's a crime to waste our time this way."

John J. Gilroy tells a similar story. He was gassed and shot through one leg. An adviser placed him at vulcanizing and various other unsuitable occupations, and now since January, 1922, a bureau adviser has insisted on his going in for watchmaking.

"They have thrown away absolutely two years of my life, and I suppose I have two more years to go for the allotted period of training. I hope, for God's sake, I can learn something suited to my disability before I am through. Everybody knows it's crazy to have a man with bad eyes learning watchmaking. Why, sometimes I can hardly tell the time. It's a pretty desperate outlook for me, I tell you, unless they wake up."

The complaint of Charles H. Weller is that being of delicate health the fumes of the gas burners used in the mechanical dentistry vocation are bad for his lungs; and also, having both his legs broken, the necessity of being kept on his feet for long periods of time in this trade causes him much pain. In addition, he says the trade is crowded, and there is no field worth talking about.

DENTISTRY TRAINING POPULAR.

"They said to me," Weller explained, "we'll let you take up shoemaking or else you stick to mechanical dentistry.' Well, I decided I'd rather waste my time in mechanical dentistry than shoemaking. It's funny, though. They want everybody to be a tailor or a shoemaker or a mechanical dentist. People don't wear out shoes any faster than they did before, nor pants, nor teeth. I don't know what they're going to do with the fellows in these courses, even if they turn out something. There is the union and all that. I've got about two more years to go. After that, I guess, the air for me."

George St. John tried to get around his case by making a proposition to the bureau adviser. A bullet tore one of the nerves in St. John's neck and has rendered him deaf in one ear. He was a music student before the war and was training his voice for a career on the stage. When he appeared for vocational training he proposed that the Government permit him six months of voice culture, and that he would be thoroughly satisfied with this. The defective ear, he said, would be no obstacle. The adviser told him he would have to take up some trade.

"But I don't want to learn mechanical dentistry or anything like that," he says he told the adviser. "I want to have my voice trained. It's what I am going to do in life, and I want only six months of it."

"But he told me," St. John related, "it couldn't be done, that he thought I would make a good mechanical dentist—me, mind you, a mechanical dentist—and that I'd have to take this or nothing. Well, I needed the money, and I had to submit. I've been in training as a mechanical dentist for two years, and I know very little about it because my heart is not in it. I don't believe I could make $10 a week at it. I'm all broken up about it, to be frank with you, because if I don't get this little chance I want it may mean the wrecking of my life."

75 PER CENT ARE HOPELESS.

It was the same story in classroom after classroom—men here and there sitting idly about, with little or no interest in the vocation to which they are bound without any apparent reason, physically incapable, in many cases, of performing the ordinary duties of that vocation and with nothing to do but wait for something to happen. It was at this school—admittedly the best in the city—that I was informed that fully 75 per cent of the veterans being trained in various makeshift institutions in the city will never really become working craftsmen in the trades in which they are being instructed.

An attempt to account for a certain portion of these is made by the assertion that even under ordinary circumstances 30 per cent of the workers could never be taught a trade. Then the question arises, Why are not the other 45 per cent taken care of? What a tremendous waste of time! What a discouraged and hopeless outlook these battered souls must have! What can they be thinking of the governmental agencies responsible for their situation?

LEG MAIMED, SOLDIER GIVEN CHORUS JOB—$10 A WEEK PLACE IN MUSICAL SHOW GOES TO CRIPPLE GIVEN VOCATIONAL "TRAINING" AS AUTO MECHANIC—ANOTHER FAILS IN TEST FOR JANITOR—MEN ASSERT THEIR REQUESTS FOR SUITABLE SCHOOLING HAVE LITTLE OR NO EFFECT.

The disabled veteran sent through a vocational school by the Government after all is interested mainly in obtaining fairly permanent work at reasonable pay to support himself and his dependents. We have seen how he has been frequently misadvised and his time wasted through neglect and incompetence. The Government has undertaken to find this job for him upon his becoming proficient in the occupation for which he has been trained. Is the soldier getting this job? There are indications that he is having a hard time of it.

Let us glance at the experience of a few of them.

There is Bennie Bershad, whose services with the Seventy-seventh Division in the Argonne won him a shattered leg, tear-gassed eyes, and an affected lung. He looks big and husky when one first sees him, but he turns out to be a weakened hulk. He has a wife and baby, and tried to make the $135 a month the Government allowed him while in training to cover the expenses of their humble home at 769 Ninth Avenue.

DENIED TRAINING AS CUTTER.

He was a motorman before the war, but he couldn't go back to that work because the wound in his leg made it impossible to stand on his feet for any length of time. He told the training officers back in 1919 that he would like to be a cutter, but they denied him training in this, he says, for no reason that he could understand. They merely suggested that he go in for a study of auto mechanism.

He spent a year in a school without picking up a thing, he says, and then he was placed in various auto shops and factories to get practical experience, but the fumes and the nature of the work was too much for him. He was sent the rounds of various garages, however, he relates, his health getting worse each day, and doing very little besides cleaning cars and towing about broken-down trucks and automobiles. This process continued, he said, from July 26, 1920, until September 30, 1922, when he was declared rehabilitated.

"But you don't know how funny it is," he explained. "After being shoved around from one shop to another and not learning a thing about engines or anything real about the mechanics of automobiles, they suddenly tell me I'm graduated as an expert auto mechanic. Can't you see how crazy it is?

"Well," he continued, "they told me to wait awhile and they would get me a job. So I waited. One week later I got a letter from the Veterans' Bureau, telling me to go to the Al Jolson theater; that there was a job for me. Every time I think about it I have to laugh all over again. I went up there, and I saw a man. I forget his name, and I told him who I was and about the letter from the bureau, and asked him about the job.

GETS JOB AS BUTTERFLY.

"Well, he took me in, and they blackened my face and put a kind of a butterfly costume on me and started to run me around for two hours. I was surprised. I didn't know what it was all about. I went to the man again and I said I was an auto mechanic and that I was rehabilitated as an auto mechanic, and I didn't know what all this monkey business was all about, and where was the mechanic job.

"He says that was the job—what I was doing—running around as a butterfly. I says, 'On the level?' And he said, 'Yes; we'll give you $10 a week to play in this show doing this.' Well, I thought it was a joke, but he said, 'It's right.' I just laughed out loud. I thought somebody was crazy. Here I was an auto mechanic—they trained me for an auto mechanic for three years and they rehabilitate me in the trade as an expert—but I am not kidding myself about that, either—but they put me down as such and then they offer me a job to be a butterfly in a play.

"But you ought to see what the letter said that I got from the bureau at the time. It said, 'If you are interested in earning some extra money at night, it is suggested that you call at the stage-door entrance of the above-named theater.' Do you get that extra-money business? Why, I wasn't doing a thing and was waiting for them to get me a job, and they talk about 'extra money.' It was a funny way of putting it, wasn't it? He must of thought I was pulling an income down from the clouds. Anyway, that's the way they tried to rehabilitate me as an auto mechanic—make a butterfly actor out of me. Can you imagine me being a butterfly?"

IS FINALLY REPLACED.

After a short interval of waiting again and after Bennie's condition had become desperate, he was replaced for training in auto mechanism at the Howard Motor Co., where he has been since October 27 and where he is to stay until March, when he has been informed he will be again rehabilitated.

"I do a little valve grinding here and washing up and towing, but I know I'm not learning much about auto mechanics," he concluded. "Maybe they think I'll be a better butterfly with six months more of auto mechanics, eh?"

James Foley, of Astoria, Long Island, N. Y., had enough trouble, too, in landing a job. Foley developed trench feet overseas, and it was decided by the training officers that he ought to master the watchmaking trade. He spent one year or thereabouts in the New York Watchmaking Academy, at Astoria, and then was rehabilitated as a master craftsman in the trade. He was put on the list for employment and spent several weeks in quest of work. The best offer he could get was $10 a week, he says. He needed the work, but he needed more money, so he was compelled to supplement his earnings as a watchmaker by working nights cleaning automobiles in a garage.

NEED FIVE YEARS' TRAINING.

"How can a man be expected to learn watchmaking in a year?" he asks. "Any watchmaker will tell you that five years of the closest application are necessary to turn out a good skilled worker in this trade. And the job that they are supposed to get for you—well, a lot of fellows have been waiting months for it."

"Are all the men in the New York watchmaking school turned out after a year's instruction?" I asked.

He replied that the course was really two and a half years, and that there were veterans there with disabilities which would prevent their ever turning out watchmakers in a hundred years.

And there is the experience of Carmelo Lafragola, of 492 Sixteenth Street, Brooklyn. Lafragola was wounded in the right arm and can do little with it. Nevertheless, he was placed in training for the tailoring business. The strain on the arm, of course, was painful and Lafragola learned little, if anything, about tailoring. In fact, he says he learned nothing about it in the three years and eight months he spent in one school or another, finally winding up at the College of the City of New York. He was actually declared rehabilitated as a tailor, without having made more than half a dozen stitches in his entire training period.

COULDN'T GET JANITOR JOB.

When it came to obtaining a place in the trade for which he had been trained, he was recommended for a janitor's position and sent to fill out an application for it. He failed to get the job.

But this is enough. Instance after instance could be cited showing the trouble the veterans have landing places after they are listed as having completed their training. It is a general complaint, also, that they frequently are offered jobs in occupations other than those they have spent so many years learning. A soldier who has been in training for years as an embalmer tells me he was rehabilitated as a night watchman, while another who had been studying bookkeeping says he was sent back to earn a living as a messenger.

No attempt could be made, of course, to look into every one of the three thousand odd cases in which I was told by Veterans' Bureau officials men had been rehabilitated and placed in some trade out of a total of more than 19,034 that had entered training in this district. But the many instances similar to those just cited which have come under my observation during the course of the inquiry indicates that there is room for much improvement in that phase of the Government's rehabilitation work.

RED TAPE BINDS 2,000 NEW YORK WAR CRIPPLES—MORE EFFICIENT INSTRUCTORS IN VOCATIONAL SCHOOLS, ADDITIONAL HOSPITALS FOR DISABLED MEN NECESSARY NOW, INVESTIGATION DISCLOSES.

If the disabled veterans in this district were asked to detail the difficulties of their admission to vocational training under Government direction, the nature of their instruction and the probable chances of their really being restored to a gainful and useful occupation, 75 out of every 100, I believe, would tell of the wearing red tape involved in the filing of claims for occupational instruction, the drawn-out discussion of their eligibility, their registration and eventual advisement as to the type of vocation they are to pursue.

They would relate how they are consulted on their preference for a particular occupation and how their wishes are usually ignored, and how an advisor says, finally, "You be a shoemaker," or "You be a mechanical dentist," (nearly every one of them are asked to go in for mechanical dentistry), or "You be a tailor, or a sign painter, and a few other trades to which the advisor at the time happens to take a fancy, and how if the veterans object, they are given the final injunction, "This or nothing."

MUST TAKE WHAT'S GIVEN.

They will recount how, being helpless and in sore need of the $100 or more a month which the Government allows them while in training and which they will not receive if they do not take the trade assigned them, they finally accept training in the occupation and find themselves in an institution where the vocation is supposed to be taught.

They will relate how they may find themselves among the fourth or third or even half of the men who have been misadvised and will, obviously, never be able to learn the trade because of their physical disability, or who have no interest in it temperamentally and will never make any progress in it.

They will tell how the school may be lacking in facilities, how it is just one of a batch of mushroom institutions where no genuine effort is made to turn out skillful craftsmen or any interest taken in their welfare.

TRANSFER CALLED IMPOSSIBLE.

They will sadly recount their repeated efforts to have themselves transferred to another occupation or school, of the interminable delays of months and sometimes years, and how it frequently winds up with their being kept at the trade for which they are not physically fitted, in which they are making no progress, and through which they could never hope to make a living.

They will tell how, after wasting several years, they may receive a notice that in three months or six months their period of training is to end (it is not to exceed four years); that they are to be placed for a short period in "placement training" (for practical experience), and that they are then to be rehabilitated; that is, declared restored to a useful and gainful occupation.

They will tell at last how, on the eve of their being thrown on their own resources, they will find themselves inadequately trained and unprepared, how the unions bar them from their organizations, and consequently from the best-paying positions, and how the trade which they are supposed to enter is already overcrowded, with no jobs available or those hardly paying a living wage.

MAY GET MESSENGER JOB.

In conclusion, they will relate how they may find themselves forced to take a job that has nothing to do with the trade for which they have been trained and may wind up as watchmen instead of tailors, or messengers instead of bookkeepers, their three or four years of special schooling, for which it has been estimated the Government is spending $14,000 a man, proving a pure waste of time.

The crisis for about 2,000 of these former soldiers will be here in a few months. They have been notified that their periods of training are about to expire. Their monthly $100 or more allowed by the Government during their training period will be cut off.

What is to be done about these men?

What steps should be taken to remedy the conditions that have made this situation possible? The cases of misadvisement cited are only a suggestion of the hundreds that have come under the eye of the writer. The schools referred to are merely illustrative of what is taking place in dozens of others. The facts point unmistakably in certain definite directions.

ACTION IS NECESSARY.

It is obvious, first of all, that those directly responsible for the occupational advisement of the soldiers were either judgment blind or incompetent. It is plain that the veterans should be taken out of occupations for which they are not fit and placed in trades less crowded and for which they are suited. The union question should be considered.

It is obvious, too, that many of the institutions to which the soldiers are sent were not created for the welfare of the men, are not really interested in their vocational progress, lack the facilities for their proper training, and should be abolished at the earliest possible moment.

It is obvious, too, that the continual changes in district managers here is in the last analysis the chief reason for the chaotic conditions. In the last 14 months there have been 8 district managers, and in less than a year 18 chiefs of training. No sooner does a manager begin to get a glimpse of the true situation when he is whisked away.

In addition there are indications that the district chief has been hampered in efforts to clean house by an unwelcome accession of incompetent subordinates, whom he appears powerless to rid himself of. Little headway can be expected unless the manager is given a free hand in dealing with the situation as he sees it, and his policies continued for a reasonable length of time.

The present manager of this district, Maj. E. F. Lent, while in office only five months, has already shown a clear understanding of the problem, in the opinion of those who are conversant with it. He has no delusions about the situation and has planned to take some vigorous steps to solve it.

WILL CALL IN ADVISERS.

In this connection it is understood that he proposes to call in the help of the most competent brains of the community in an advisory capacity.

No one has taken a deeper interest in the situation nor can speak more authoritatively on the soldiers' problem than Col. Cornelius W. Wickersham, chairman of the hospital committee of the American Legion, Department of New York. His views follow:

"The problem to-day in New York State is twofold:

"First. We need an additional Government hospital for the care of mental and shell-shock cases. Under the Veterans' Bureau the country is divided into 14 districts. Ours is the second, embracing New York, Connecticut, and New Jersey. In this district there are at the present time 342 veterans of the war suffering from shell shock and mental diseases in one Government hospital in the Bronx, and there are 826 such men scattered throughout various contract hospitals over the three States.

"The State government has given some relief to this most disturbing situation by setting aside portions of the fine State hospital at Kings Park for these men. There are at present 178 veterans at that institution. The public must understand that a bed in a general hospital is of no use to cure a shell-shock or mental case. Special equipment and special treatment are needed for this class of cases, and these can be best, and in some cases only, furnished in a hospital built and equipped for the purpose. The number of these cases is still increasing, and an additional Government hospital for mental cases, with facilities for 1,000 beds is an imperative need—not 10 years from to-day, but now—if we are to save the minds of a majority of these men and give them a reasonable chance for cure.

FOURTEEN THOUSAND RECEIVING TRAINING.

"Second. We have the problem of rehabilitation. There are approximately 14,000 disabled veterans now receiving training in the second district looking toward their rehabilitation as useful citizens able to make their own way in the world.

"Two kinds of training are given, namely, placement training, which means the placing of a man in a business, store, shop, or factory where he can learn his new trade under working conditions; the other is institutional training—that is, where a man is given free a course at a law school, medical school, accounting school, or other institution for teaching him the theory and practice of a business or profession.

"It will be seen at once that many problems confront the Veterans' Bureau in its sincere endeavor to accomplish the rehabilitation of these men. One of the present problems is the difficulty of maintaining contact with the men in placement training and of seeing that a man receives the kind of training for which he is best fitted. In the past there have been many misfits—men who because of their disability were unable to engage in certain trades or occupations but who, nevertheless, were started in course of training in these very trades or occupations. Other men have been placed in kinds of training for which they had no qualifications and in which they could not be happy or successful. There has been a lack of adequate attention to these individual cases, and the result is that only a small percentage of the large number of men whom the Government has undertaken to rehabilitate have completed their training and are actually rehabilitated.

"The problem is further complicated by the fact that any inefficient method of dealing with it will inevitably tend toward pauperization and not toward true rehabilitation and the placing of a man on his feet where he can make his own way in the world. This problem is one that peculiarly requires the sympathetic interest of all members of the community and such cooperation with the Veterans' Bureau as will best assist that organization in obtaining real results.

"The American Legion is now working along these lines, as well as endeavoring to assist in the solution of the many minor problems of this great work."

Col. Lee Garnett Day, chairman of the rehabilitation committee of the American Legion, second district, for the past year, offers the following comment and suggestions:

"If compensation and health for the crippled of the late war could be redeemed like Liberty bond coupons, these few lines would be unnecessary. Rehabilitation and study of a useful trade, like a new subway, is not gained on tracks of pen and ink. Two tuberculosis hospitals were approved for New York State last summer, one at Tupper Lake and the other at Beacon. Col. R. C. Forbes, national Director of the Veterans' Bureau, promised foundations before frost set in last fall. What is the delay? When will they be finished? Will it be 1924, 1925, or 1930? If we were now actually at war, would not public opinion and the necessities of war demand their construction at all possible speed?

"Four hundred and thirty million dollars will be disbursed by the Veterans' Bureau in Washington in the fiscal year of 1923. The second district, in which is included our New York, has a pay roll and overhead of more than $2,500,000 for 1923. Sixty-five million dollars is the contemplated budget for the fiscal year. The local bureau has had a rough road in administration. Eight different directors in rapid succession have been attempting to organize 140,000 claim folders, 26,000 monthly compensations, and 12,000 training programs. A thousand individuals have fought to find their missing claim files, but few have tried to see from a district manager's chair what red tape and politics can do to discourage hope and efficiency.

OFFICERS ARE CRITICIZED.

"There are more than 6,000 men taking vocational training, and approximately 5,000 are in placement training in New York City alone. It has been shown, and we were long cognizant of it, that the greater part of these men were assigned to their training by training officers who had not the broad experience to consider or judge their qualifications, both mental and physical, with regard to their previous trade or business experience before entering the war, their hereditary history, the extent of their disability, the effect of the war upon their mentality, knowledge of the trades that could absorb them, or the sincerity of the schools professing to give a capable and honest tuition.

"The remedy is a revamping of not only the men themselves but the schools, and what is perhaps of greater importance, a constant surveillance of the men. The mushroom schools, however, should be cleaned out at once.

"Again, there have been too many managers. A continuance of policy must be assured. The manager must be afforded the unrestricted freedom of selecting his associates. He should be allowed to build up contact with a group of prominent medical advisers in tuberculosis, neuropsychiatric and vocational cases. It should be recognized that the Government is not as fully qualified to handle special cases as are outside agencies which have made this province their special study.

CITIZENS SHOULD HELP.

"The district manager, too, should be encouraged to make contacts with groups of business men, who could no doubt be able to coordinate the specific requirements of the men now in training. It is useless, however, for citizens' committees and well-meaning individuals to offer their services if the Government does not wish them, but as these citizens were invited to prepare for war and carry it through, we do not think that it is out of the Government's scope to ask the assistance of chambers of commerce and business men's organizations, who by virtue of their membership are more conversant with the past, present, and future conditions.

"One special word on the matter of advisement. It is difficult to suggest an increase in salary for this position in New York alone. It is a vital matter, however, to the men. There must be an adequate mind to deal with the veteran's case when he comes up for advisement or readvisement, as the whole course of a man's life is influenced by the judgment as to the trade or profession he is to pursue. I would suggest that the Government and the bureau officials give this subject their closest attention if the training problem is to be intelligently dealt with."

Let us turn for a moment to the medical and hospital care that is given the disabled man before he is prepared for vocational training. The situation at present is said to be fairly satisfactory in certain respects only. Tales of neglect in this hospital or that continue to reach the ear of the public, and the demands for additional space adequately to care for the sick and wounded are being made from time to time of the governmental agencies charged with the care of the disabled veteran.

MANY PATIENTS ARE TREATED.

The latest records show that large numbers of tubercular soldiers are still distributed through private and State hospitals in the metropolitan area, that there are 284 in private sanatoriums and houses at Saranac, 81 at Liberty, and 829 in State hospitals and asylums. At New Haven, the only Federal institution in this district for the care of tubercular patients, there are 500 veterans. This, however, does not begin to account for the entire number of men suffering from this trouble alone in the second district, the number really running from 5,500 to 6,000.

It is complained, however, that these men do not receive every care that they should, not from any deliberate neglect, but because they are generally crowded into institutions already hard pressed for space and where they can't possibly receive the close attention they should. In addition it is represented that the laxness and freedom of some of the boarding places where many of the men have been temporarily placed are certanly not conducive to a speedy cure of the veterans, and that the discipline and strictness of the Government conducted institution is necessary if the soldier is to be adequately taken care of and restored to health.

The Government has therefore been urged to complete at the earliest possible time the two new tubercular hospitals at Chelsea and Tupper Lake.

ELEVEN HUNDRED AND SIXTY-EIGHT NERVOUS CASES.

With the respect to the care of the nervous and mentally diseased cases it is pointed out that there are 1,168 patients afflicted with these troubles now distributed in 26 institutions throughout the State, and that only 342 of them are in a Government hospital—the United States Veterans' Hospital, No. 81, in the Bronx.

Organizations interested in the welfare of the veterans will insist that the Government build an additional hospital of at least 1,000 beds in the State for mental cases; that a general medical and surgical hospital be built in this city of a capacity of 250 beds, and that the use of the hospital at Ward's Island for mental cases be gradually discontinued, the number of patients and facilities at Kings Park State Hospital to be increased until the new Government mental hospital is provided.

To expose a bad situation without suggesting the remedy for it is a futile process. The Tribune, in the above series of articles, has shown the ineptness, the inefficiency, the misunderstanding, on which rests the Government's vocational training for New York's veterans of the World War.

What remedial step seems best?

It seems clear from the Tribune's evidence that the main reason for the bad conditions has been the constant "turn-over" due, probably, to politics. The fault does not lie with the local control for the moment. Maj. W. F. Lent is the best chief Veterans' Bureau District No. 2 has had; but he inherits a situation made by a half dozen predecessors, each of whom held office but a few months.

The fact is that the Veterans' Bureau as a whole needs a larger visioned management than has ever been accorded it. It is literally true to say that no American is too big for this national responsibility. Leonard Wood—doctor and administrator—would not have been too big for the job. But Wood is tied to the Philippines. The administration's other doctor and administrator is Postmaster General Work. Even a Cabinet officer is not too big for the job, and informed opinion in Army circles knows that the job is not too big for Doctor Work.

The administration has faced an irrepressible conflict over the soldiers' bonus. That conflict bids fair to break forth again. Most of its passion and prejudice rest upon the Government's mishandling of the wounded, sick, or mentally affected soldiers of the World War. An American of the first rank in charge of the Veterans' Bureau would not only accomplish a great service in the reduction of sheer human misery; he would also take the grievance out of the bonus issue by assuring the country that a grateful Government was taking proper care of its injured sons.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves that all debate on the paragraph be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas] having resumed the chair, Mr. MCARTHUR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13696) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

There was no demand for a separate vote, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit. I am against the bill. I do not know whether the gentleman from Tennessee is or not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman from Tennessee against the bill?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I am.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee moves to recommit the bill, H. R. 13696, to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same forthwith with the following amendment: At the end of the last paragraph on page 34 insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"No part of the sums appropriated in this act shall be used in the preparation or dissemination of any propaganda, arguments, or statements in favor of or in opposition to the passage of legislation: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the preparation of data and statements solely for presentation at hearings of congressional committees or to Members of Congress in response to requests for such information."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the motion to recommit, that it is not germane to the subject matter and is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will yield, I call attention to the fact that this direct question was ruled on in Committee of the Whole, and the point of order was overruled.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What does the gentleman from Tennessee say about the proviso which the Chair is informed was not presented in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. No; it was not in the one that was offered and acted upon, but that is in accord with the proviso in the preceding paragraph and deals with substantially the same subject. It simply restricts the legislation, and, taken as a whole, it undoubtedly constitutes a clear limitation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Tennessee contend that the proviso goes back to the limitation?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. An exception to the limitation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to recommit the bill with instructions.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee) there were—ayes 27, noes 52.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 77, nays 141, not voting 211, as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. WOOD of Indiana, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ANTHONY, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 13793; Rept. No. 1397) making appropriations for military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee reserves all points of order.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a change of reference of House Concurrent Resolution 77 from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, what is the character of the resolution?

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, the resolution provides for the appointment of a commission to make investigations concerning the silver situation, the production of silver. It is a resolution dealing entirely with the production of silver and has nothing to do at all with the subject of coinage, weights, and measures. The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures consents to the change.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, it just strikes me from what the gentleman states about it that this probably ought to go to the Committee on Rules. Does it increase the power of the Committee on Mines and Mining, or the power which any other committee possesses?

Mr. COLTON. No; it simply provides for an investigating committee to be appointed by the President of the United States.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That would go to the Committee on Rules, I would say to the gentleman, in the regular order of business. Is there any hurry about it? Will not the gentleman defer his request until Monday?

Mr. COLTON. I think there is no hurry about it, and I would just as soon defer the matter until Monday as not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Let us have a chance to look into it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Utah withdraws his request for the present.

CONFERENCE REPORT—INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the Interior Department appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan calls up the conference report on the Interior Department appropriation bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. And ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read the statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3 of the bill, line 9, strike out the figures "$221,520" and insert the figures "$222,020."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, that is merely a change in the total, and I move that the House recede and concur.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 30: Page 29, line 23, after the word "herein," insert: "Provided further, That hereafter upon a determination of the heirs to any trust or restricted Indian property of the value of $250 or more, or to any allotment, or, after approval by the Secretary of the Interior, of any will covering such trust or restricted property, there shall be paid by such heirs, or by the beneficiaries under such will, or from the estate of the decedent, or from the proceeds of sale of the allotment, or from any trust funds belonging to the estate of the decedent, the sum of $20 where the appraised value of the estate of the decedent is $250 or more and does not exceed $1,000. Where the appraised value of the estate of the decedent is more than $1,000 and less than $2,000, $25; where the appraised value of the estate of the decedent is $2,000 or more and does not exceed $3,000, $30; where the appraised value of the estate of the decedent is more than $3,000 but does not exceed $5,000, $50; where the appraised value of the estate of the decedent is more than $5,000 but does not exceed $7,500, $65; and where the appraised value of the estate of the decedent is more than $7,500, $75; which amount shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury of the United States, and a report shall be made annually to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior on or before the first Monday in December of all moneys collected and deposited as herein provided."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur. And in connection with that I would like to state, Mr. Speaker, that this language provides for the increased fees to be paid out of the estates of Indians in certain cases. It is recommended by the Indian Bureau. The same language is embodied in a bill which has been recommended to the House by the Committee on Indian Affairs. I have consulted the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER], chairman of that committee, and our action in this instance is not disagreed to by him.

Mr. CARTER. If the gentleman will permit, it is also stated by the Indian Bureau under the present language of the law a deficiency occurs each year and this matter is not self-sustaining. Under these changes it is thought by the bureau that the item will be completely self-sustaining.

Mr. CRAMTON. It will make this work self-sustaining.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Wherein does the suggested legislative amendment differ from existing law?

Mr. CRAMTON. There is some increase in the fee charged.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any data as to the amount of mony that at present accrues from the administration of these trust estates, and how much it is estimated will accrue if this provision is adopted?

Mr. CRAMTON. My recollection is that there is a deficiency of between $7,000 and $8,000 under this statute, and that this increase of fee will be sufficient to take care of that deficit. In other words, the increase will be somewhere between $7,000 and $8,000, or a little more.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much accrues under the existing law at the present rates?

Mr. CRAMTON. I do not have that at hand at the moment, although it is in the hearings. I will say that our committee went into this in the hearings, but because it is a legislative item we did not include it in the bill as reported by us.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the theory upon which the Government is proceeding to levy fees on trust estates when they are transferred to the various Indians?

Mr. CRAMTON. The scale of fees under the present law runs from $15 to $50. The change proposed is from $20 to $75.

Mr. STAFFORD. The theory in levying the fee is that there would be a sufficient amount raised to meet the administration expenses of the trust?

Mr. CRAMTON. That is the idea.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 31: After line 7 insert——

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, without the reading of the amendment, to move to recede and concur with an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, is it very long?

Mr. CRAMTON. The only difference between the Senate amendment and the House amendment is a cut of about $10,000. I will withdraw my request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 31: Page 34, after line 7, insert: "The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to establish and maintain the former Fort Apache military post as an Indian boarding school for the purpose of carrying out treaty obligations, to be known as the Theodore Roosevelt Indian School. For support and education of 350 pupils, including pay of superintendent, $78,750; for repairs, remodeling, and improvement, $17,800; for purchase of equipment, $17,500; for collection and transportation of pupils, $1,200; in all, $115,250, to be immediately available: Provided, That the Fort Apache military post, and land appurtenant thereto, shall remain in the possession and custody of the Secretary of the Interior so long as they shall be required for Indian school purposes."

Mr. CRAMTON. I move that the House recede and concur with an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan moves to recede and concur with an amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CRAMTON moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 31 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following:

"The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to establish and maintain the former Fort Apache military post as an Indian boarding school for the purpose of carrying out treaty obligations, to be known as the Theodore Roosevelt Indian School. For support and education of 350 pupils, including pay of superintendent, $70,000; for repairs, remodeling, and improvement, $17,800; for purchase of equipment, $17,500; in all, $105,300, to be immediately available: Provided, That the Fort Apache military post, and land appurtenant thereto, shall remain in the possession and custody of the Secretary of the Interior so long as they shall be required for Indian school purposes."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Michigan, to recede and concur with an amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman explain in a word how these children are receiving instruction?

Mr. CRAMTON. They are not receiving it. We have treaty obligations with the Navajos, but, as I remember, there are about 2,000 that are not in schools.

Mr. CARTER. Five thousand.

Mr. CRAMTON. This will take care of a portion of them, utilizing a military post for that purpose; a post that is not now in use. The amendment that I am offering reduces the item about $10,000.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Michigan, to concur with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 36: On page 77, line 22, insert: "Such papers when reproduced for sale to be sold at not less than cost plus 10 per cent."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan moves to recede and concur with an amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CRAMTON moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 36 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Such other papers when reproduced for sale to be sold at not less than cost plus 10 per cent."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, the only change suggested in my amendment is to insert the word "other," in order to clarify the sense.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not intended that the papers included in the proceedings shall be sold in that way, but only "other papers" are to be sold under these conditions?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes; only that class of papers. The preceding classes are covered by existing law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 37: Page 85, line 13, insert: "Provided, That repayment of the construction cost of the project may be made through a division by the Secretary of the Interior of such cost into a primary construction charge and a supplemental construction charge, of approximate equality, the former payable according to section 2 and the latter payable according to section 4 of the extension act of August 13, 1914 (38 Stat. L., p. 686)."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House recede and concur.

Mr. CRAMTON. And in connection with that I should state that this came to us and a hearing was had upon it, but it being of a legislative character, it was not included in the bill by the House committee. It has the full indorsement of Director Davis. It is apparent that something must be done. It only puts this project within the existing law referred to. It has the approval of Mr. SMITH, chairman of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands of the House, and our course in agreeing to it was in accordance with his wishes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 53: Page 107, line 8, insert: "Hereafter the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, in his discretion and under regulations to be prescribed by him, to give surplus elk, buffalo, bear, beaver, and predatory animals inhabiting Yellowstone National Park to Federal, State, county, and municipal authorities for preserves, zoos, zoological gardens, and parks: Provided, That the said Secretary may sell or otherwise dispose of the surplus buffalo of the Yellowstone National Park herd, and all moneys received from the sale of any such surplus buffalo shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan moves to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. That provision, Mr. Speaker, is the recommendation of Mr. Albright, the superintendent of the Yellowstone National Park and is to meet their pressing problems. I have consulted with the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT], chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, who is in accord with the amendment. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks to include the statement of Mr. Albright.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

The above provision authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to give surplus elk, bear, beaver, and predatory animals to public institutions. It also authorizes the donation of buffalo in the same manner, but in addition gives the Secretary permission to sell or otherwise dispose of the buffalo as may, in his judgment, seem advisable. In this latter instance he is not bound to confine the disposition to public institutions.

For some years past the department has been donating surplus elk, buffalo, and other animals to public preserves, municipal parks, etc., and this practice has enabled many States to stock their lands with animals, particularly elk, besides reducing to a degree the problem in Yellowstone—which, by the way, exists in no other national park—of caring for more animals than is economically possible. An investigation made a year or two ago by the Biological Survey of the United States Department of Agriculture produced evidence that the whole experiment of transplanting elk was very successful. These animals are shipped in larger numbers than any of the others because their population is larger and they multiply comparatively fast.

The authority sought above, therefore, as far as the animals generally are concerned, is only to give sanction to what has heretofore been considered proper within the administrative discretion of the Secretary. It will, however, prevent any question arising in the future in connection with this feature of park work.

Notwithstanding the fact that practically every request for buffalo coming from a public institution has been granted, the demand from this source is too limited to have any appreciable effect in keeping the herd to such a size that it can be accommodated on the range that is available. Therefore, in the interests of better administration it is desirable that some other means should be available for disposing of the surplus, either by sale or otherwise, in the discretion of the Secretary. For instance, there are in this country a number of private owners of buffalo herds who are making a bona fide effort to reestablish this magnificent animal, and to encourage them in the undertaking the department should be in a position to allow them from time to time to have some of the surplus Yellowstone buffalo for the infusion of new blood.

An expression of opinion of the proposed plan for the distribution of surplus buffalo was recently sought from some of the foremost game conservation organizations in this country, and favorable replies were received from the American Humane Association, the National Association of Audubon Societies, the American Game Protective and Propagation Association, and the New York Zoological Society.

The "tame" herd of buffalo in Yellowstone Park was established under authority contained in the act of July 1, 1902 (32 Stat., 574), with an appropriation of $15,000 for the purpose. Twenty-one animals were purchased in the fall of that year, and these have multiplied until now the herd contains 578. It is estimated that the "wild" herd, a remnant of the vast hordes that once roamed this region, numbers from 125 to 150, but it has no place in the present discussion.

In the distribution of buffalo or other animals no expense is incurred by the Government, as the invariable rule has been made that the recipient must defray all expenses incident to capturing, crating, and transporting the animals.

H. M. ALBRIGHT.
Superintendent Yellowstone National Park.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, one of its clerks, announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. SUTHERLAND and Mr. GERRY members of the Joint Select Committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the office of the Comptroller General of the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 13559, "An act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes."

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 3846. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a Veterans' Bureau and to improve the facilities and service of such bureau, and further to amend and modify the war risk insurance act," approved August 9, 1921; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. COLTON. I renew my request for unanimous consent for change of reference of House Concurrent Resolution 77 from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent for the change of reference referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have examined the resolution since the gentleman proffered his request a few moments ago, and I have no objection to the change of reference. I want simply to say that it is a rather singular sort of resolution. It provides for the appointment by the President of the United States of a committee made up wholly of Members of Congress. I have an idea that some Members of the House may object to that kind of legislation.

Mr. COLTON. In answer to what the gentleman has said I will say that this is a resolution introduced by Senator NICHOLSON, of Colorado, and introduced in the House by me at his request. It will be rewritten and changed and reintroduced, and the provision that the gentleman refers to will be eliminated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the reference of the resolution will be made as requested.

There was no objection.

CLAIMS OF NORWEGIAN SUBJECTS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES (S. DOC. NO. 288).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President, which, with the accompanying documents, was ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State respecting the arbitration of claims of Norwegian subjects against the United States arising out of requisitions by the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation requesting that I recommend that an appropriation be made to satisfy the award rendered by the arbitral tribunal against the United States, with interest to date of payment, and that in making the appropriation authorization be granted to withhold from the total amount of the award the sum of $22,800 with which to pay the claim of Page Bros., American citizens, mentioned in the agreement of June 30, 1921, and in the award of the tribunal.

I recommend that in order to effect prompt satisfaction of the award made by the arbitral tribunal the Congress authorize the requisite appropriation.

A copy of the award is attached hereto.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 12, 1923.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the bill passed to-day.

There was no objection.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, January 13, 1923.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 9, 1923.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate resumes the consideration of House bill 13481, the Agricultural appropriation bill.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13481) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to be inserted on page 10, line 18, after the numerals "1914,"

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 10, line 18, after the numerals "1914" and before the colon, insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That in the expenditure of the appropriations carried in this and the preceding paragraph, if the Secretary of Agriculture and the proper officials of the college in any State fail to mutually agree upon the plans employed in the extension or demonstration work, then in no case shall any change in the plan be made in such State different from that employed in such State during the year ending January 1, 1922.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the Senator in charge of the bill and to the Senate that this is merely a limitation upon the appropriation, and I have offered it for this purpose and this purpose only. In the administration of the fund the law provides specifically that there shall be complete harmony and cooperation existing between the officials representing the college in each State and the Secretary of Agriculture in undertaking the extension and demonstration work. Indeed, the law specifically states and sets out that there shall be no misunderstanding between the State authorities and the Secretary of Agriculture; that any plan that might be contemplated in the particular State "shall be mutually agreed upon between the Secretary of Agriculture and the proper official representing the college in each State."

It is merely a rumor, so to speak, but I judge from certain remarks made by one of the high officials at a meeting of representatives of the land-grant colleges in Washington recently that there might be undertaken a change in certain States with reference to the extension work. The plan that has been adopted in the States in the South, especially in my State, of which I have more knowledge than of any other, though the plan has been the same in other States, has worked admirably.

The women workers in charge of the home demonstration work with respect to canning clubs organized by the girls have worked wonders. The same statement applies to the work of the demonstration agents with respect to the club work among the boys. They desire no change because they feel that the plan now in vogue in those States is the best plan and will bring about the best and most beneficent results. But the authorities, or one or two of the authorities new in the business in Washington perhaps, desire to change in some particular some special plan. The amendment merely contemplates that where the authorities of the State can not mutually agree with the Secretary of Agriculture, there shall be no change effected, but the same plan shall be adopted that was employed in those particular States in 1921.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. What particular criticism does the Senator find in the law as presently fashioned?

Mr. HARRISON. I have no criticism of the law as presently fashioned. I think it is a very splendid law.

Mr. McNARY. Then why does the Senator seek to change it?

Mr. HARRISON. I will explain why I say that. I know that it seems strange that I should seek to change it in the slightest respect if the present law is all right. The present provision of the law reads:

And all sums appropriated by this act for use for demonstration or extension work within any State shall be used and expended in accordance with plans mutually agreed upon by the Secretary of Agriculture and the proper officials of the college in such State.

That is absolutely all right, but the trouble is that with the power and influence of a certain Assistant Secretary of Agriculture it is contemplated to change the plan in a slight particular in certain States, one in which the authorities of the State might acquiesce, but which is not agreeable to them. The amendment which I have proposed merely provides that in the event they shall not mutually agree, the same plan shall be kept in force which was in force prior to January 1, 1922, and which has been in force heretofore since the enactment of the law.

I might go on and make a very extended argument in behalf of the matter and show more necessity for it. I hope the amendment may be agreed to. It can work no injury to the department, but will make certain officials who have been spending the money in certain States feel better about it and feel that the department is not going to revolutionize the plan that has worked so well in those States. It is feared—in fact, many of them contemplate—that it will put out of service the women who have gone around and organized the girls into canning clubs and substitute some director of the department who is a man to organize the girls in the canning work. I feel about a man organizing girls to do canning work a good deal like I feel when I see a man operate upon a piano. It seems to me it is a work the women should undertake, and that the same plan which has been in force and worked so well should be continued. I hope the Senator will not object to the amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Let me ask the Senator if this would not work toward the undoing of any standard form of cooperative work?

Mr. HARRISON. Not at all.

Mr. McNARY. Would not each State have its own plan?

Mr. HARRISON. Why not? Conditions in the country vary with respect to the different States. A plan that is contemplated and put in force in certain Western States might be all right there, but the same plan would not meet the approval of the authorities in other States of the Union. It might be perfectly well for a man to be put at the head of the home demonstration work in certain States of the Union, and let him go around and organize the girls into canning clubs and make demonstrations to them. It might enlarge the membership of the clubs and it might render greater service. But I say that in my State a man could not do that work, and he would not receive the backing of the people, because they believe that the women should be at the head of the demonstration work with respect to the organization of girls' clubs. So I say we can not have a uniform system in practice in every State of the Union, and it should not be uniform, but in carrying on the extension work it could be such a plan as would meet the approval of the States, and, as I said, the States differ as to conditions and the wishes of the people.

Mr. McNARY. If the Senator's theory were carried out, he would take the territorial divisions of the State and reduce them to counties, and he would have 2,252 counties in the country having different standards and forms of operating under Federal aid.

Mr. HARRISON. Not necessarily at all, because I think they are going to mutually agree. I think it is going to work as it always has worked. There never has been any misunderstanding until within the last year or two, when the proposition was made by one individual, who had never been in the Department of Agriculture until 18 months ago, undertaking to revolutionize the whole proposition. There has never been any complaint heretofore on the part of the officials in any State to the Agricultural Department of the way the plan has worked in certain States, because they have seen the great benefits that accrued from it. The amendment does not provide that they must do it, but that if they can not mutually agree upon it then the same plan which operated prior to 1922 shall continue.

Mr. McNARY. It simply means if there is a disagreement between the Department of Agriculture and the authorities of the State that the State can have its way in the expenditure of the money.

Mr. HARRISON. The law now says they shall mutually agree, but under the influence and the power of the department of course they can influence the officials in a State to consent to a proposition that they really do not desire. That should not be done. No plan should be foisted upon a State that does not meet the approval of the officials or the people of the State.

Mr. McNARY. Does not the Senator then believe there should be a general plan, in unified form, under the law?

Mr. HARRISON. I certainly do not believe there should be any plan invoked and put upon a State that does not meet the conditions in the State and the wishes of the people with respect to doing the work. The Senator does not believe, I assume, that a man can organize girls into canning clubs and demonstrate as well as a woman could do the work. The women are the ones who have been carrying on the work. The plan now considered by a certain official in the Department of Agriculture is to rid the service of the women in the home-demonstration work.

I would be very glad if the Senator would allow the amendment to be adopted and let it go to conference, and let them call before the conferees a certain official who is in charge of the matter and get an explanation from him. If they do not contemplate making the change, I shall care nothing in the world about the amendment and would not in that event insist upon it. But I think that if they do contemplate that change, which from all circumstances they do, the amendment ought to be adopted, because they should not change a plan that has worked so well in certain States of the Union.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator has offered his amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. I have offered the amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Does the Senator want to dispose of it at the present time?

Mr. HARRISON. I would like to do so.

Mr. McNARY. I make the point of order against the amendment that it is new legislation.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will withhold his point of order for a little while.

Mr. McNARY. I am very happy to withhold it for the present.

Mr. STERLING. I sympathize with the amendment that has been offered by the Senator from Mississippi. I am a firm believer in the principle that the State or the State authorities should have the initiative in proposing plans for farm-demonstration and home-economics work. I contended for that principle when the original bill was under consideration back in 1914. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the State authorities best know conditions of climate, soil, and so forth, and are better qualified to decide as to the needs of the State and of the several communities in the State than are officials of the Department of Agriculture here at Washington. The States should have the initiative in determining needs and proposing plans. It will be a stimulus to the various States to take an interest in farm-demonstration and home-economics work if they understand that it is for them to take such initiative and suggest the various plans and methods for conducting such activities. Therefore, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, on the point of order I desire to say that the amendment is a limitation of the expenditure and carries no additional appropriation. The amendment is in reality merely a limitation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What does it limit?

Mr. HARRISON. I will ask the Secretary to read the first part of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The amendment reads:

Provided, That in the expenditure of the appropriations carried in this and the preceding paragraphs——

Mr. HARRISON. The amendment, in effect, provides that in the expenditure of the appropriation the condition set forth shall attach.

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment is not a limitation of the appropriation in any way, but it changes existing law.

Mr. HARRISON. I modify my amendment to read that "No part of this expenditure shall be made except under" the conditions set forth.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President, if a conflict should arise between the Government and the State no part of the appropriation could be expended even if the work were undertaken. It does seem to me that if the Government of the United States is going to appropriate money to be expended for State purposes and for State purposes only it ought to have something to say as to how that money shall be expended.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not trying to provide that the Federal Government shall not have anything to say. The law now provides that the Government shall have something to say, and that the State authorities also shall have something to say, for the intention of the law was that the Federal Government and the State government should mutually agree upon a plan. The Agricultural Department is now undertaking in certain States to change the plan, although they assure the committee they are not attempting to do so. Their spokesman, however, before the meeting of the land-grant colleges here in Washington recently stated to the contrary, and the forms which are being prepared indicate that such an attempt is being made. It does seem to me that plans ought mutually to be agreed upon; and that is all I want. I do not wish, however, to see them put over a proposition that all the persons who are employed by the Federal Government to expend the money in the States shall operate solely under the rules promulgated by the department.

Mr. SMOOT. The trouble with the Senator's amendment is that what the Senator states is not what the amendment provides. The amendment proposes to give the authority for the expenditure of the money in a manner that might not be approved by the representatives of the Government. It is a change of existing law, and I can not see but that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. HARRISON. Let me say to the Senator that I think, as he will appreciate, the amendment only provides, as the existing law provides, that the Federal and State Governments shall mutually agree. The amendment provides that if the State and Federal Governments can not mutually agree, then there shall be followed the plans upon which they did agree from the time the law was first enacted until the 1st of January, 1922. Those plans have worked well and were in accord with the department's ideas. Those plans are perfectly acceptable; but the new plans that might be contemplated might not be acceptable. Consequently they would not be mutually agreed upon; but under the influence and power of the administration here or of one man of the administration—for I do not think the Secretary of Agriculture knows anything about it—a plan could be put into effect which would not meet the wishes of a particular State.

I do not think there is anything in the proposition of having a uniform plan all over the country. A plan which in one State might meet the conditions there would not cost any more than the plan followed in Minnesota adopted to meet the wishes of the people of that State.

Mr. McNARY. Has the Senator found any complaint of the efforts which the department has made to adapt its plans to different State conditions?

Mr. HARRISON. Not until now.

Mr. McNARY. I have not heard any complaint from any source.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Oregon would not because, perhaps, the plan contemplated would meet the wishes of his people, but I have heard complaints, and they come from more than one State.

Mr. McNARY. Has the Senator from Mississippi found it impossible for his State mutually to agree with the Government upon some plan for extension work?

Mr. HARRISON. The State and Federal officials have agreed heretofore, and they will in this case, because they know that they will lose their jobs if they do not acquiesce in the plan, although their judgment may be that it is not the best plan. I hold in my hand a report which has just been prepared.

This proposed new form of a report practically ignores home-demonstration work and organization. At a recent meeting of the representatives of the land-grant colleges, held in this city, this question arose. Mr. Smith, one of the chiefs in the department, I am very reliably informed, stated in discussing the matter that the new report form was based on the assumption that the men agents could do the nutrition, food, and other home economics work for the women and girls of their respective counties, and that the emphasis was on the employment of men agents at "adequate" salaries rather than the employment of women agents.

It is a scheme to remove the women who may now be at the head of home-demonstration work in certain States and who are specially qualified to carry on the work. Let us reward them for the splendid services they have rendered in no such way as is contemplated, but show our appreciation to them and to the girls of this country taught by them by making it possible to retain these women in the service and continue the practice and policy that has reflected credit on the department here and bestowed great benefits upon so many of the girls and boys and people of the country.

Mr. LADD. Mr. President, I am not fully prepared to take part in this discussion, I will admit, and I do not know just what there may be back of the pending proposal, but I may say that I have no sympathy whatever with the attempt to eliminate women workers in the demonstration fields, if the purpose of the provision in the bill is to do that, as has been suggested. I am entirely convinced that the more latitude that is given to the States in determining the policy for each State the better and more efficient will be the work. The difficulty at the present time in this country is that very frequently the regulations and provisions which are made here in Washington, while they may be fitted for one State do not meet the needs in another State. As one who has had more than 30 years' experience in the particular field, I feel that I know something of the needs of the country and that the rules which are adopted and the methods which are in use in Massachusetts or Pennsylvania are not adapted to some of the Southern States and some of the Western States. In other fields than this particular one is that true. It is particularly true in the case of vocational education at the present time. I am thoroughly in sympathy with the idea expressed by the Senator from Mississippi. I do not know whether there is need for the change or not, and therefore, as I have stated, perhaps I am not in a position to take an intelligent part in this discussion.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair will have to rule that the amendment proposes general legislation and is subject to the point of order. The point of order is therefore sustained.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, what was the statement of the Chair?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair ruled that the point of order was well taken.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I was about to discuss the question. I will discuss it briefly anyhow.

Mr. McNARY. Does the Senator desire that the point of order be withdrawn for the present?

Mr. HEFLIN. I was about to ask the Senator from Oregon to withdraw the point of order, but the Chair had ruled before I could make the request, and so I will now consume a little time in discussing the matter.

Mr. President, in the South and West prizes have been offered by various interests to encourage girls to learn something about the canning of fruits and vegetables. Girls have gone to college where they have been trained especially for this character of work. We opened up the field for them when the Democrats were in power, and it has given employment to a vast number of girls skilled in this kind of work. They have expended money in order to equip themselves for it and some who have returned home from college have been appointed to positions and have gone out into the counties and organized girls' clubs and shown the girls how to do this work. They are teaching the wives of farmers how to can fruits and vegetables, and the work has been of vast benefit. Now we are met with an effort here to strike down that activity; to prevent women from engaging in this character of work and to turn it over to men. I submit that it is unfair to the women of the country who are now being educated and are educating themselves for this particular kind of work. It is not right that some one who has influence with the powers that be here in Washington should be able to have a provision written into this bill which will strike down this work now being conducted by women and substitute men in this particular field of activity which should be occupied by women. The proposal can not be defended in any State in the Union.

I said on yesterday, Mr. President—and I am going to repeat it now—that little by little and bit by bit the rights of the State are being crucified under this Republican administration. Local self-government in America is being destroyed. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD] are right in their support of the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

In connection with an activity of this character the rules and regulations which may suit the conditions in Oregon or in New York may not suit in Alabama, Mississippi, Georgia, and other Southern States and some of the Western States. Why should we have rules and regulations foisted upon us that are antagonistic to our best interests and that militate against what we are trying to do for the good of our people? Are the principles of common sense and fairness to be thrown aside because some theorist in Washington consults the Budget Bureau and induces the Budget Bureau to write a provision saying in effect, "We will give you this money to do this work provided you do it in this way." Shall the Congress become helpless in the matter? That is what we are facing here to-day.

I dare say that two-thirds of the Senators in this Chamber would vote to incorporate the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi in the bill, but they are denied that opportunity because of the ruling of the Chair on the point of order made by my friend from Oregon. Senators, it is time to call a halt; it is time to stop, look, and listen. Whither are we drifting? Here is a body which wants to do one thing; but the Chair, under the point of order made by one Senator, gags and ties the Senate so that even two-thirds can not do what they desire to do under the hard, fast, and unfair rules which have been imposed upon this body.

Mr. President, I make this appeal for the hundreds and thousands of girls and women of the country. I insist that the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi ought to be incorporated in the bill, in order that fair treatment may be accorded to the women who are preparing themselves for this particular kind of work and who have spent many hundreds and thousands of dollars in order to educate themselves along this particular line. Yet, after they have equipped themselves, they find themselves faced with a condition brought about by the Republican Congress under which they are told, in effect, "You girls are not wanted; there is a provision in the statute that you can not carry on this work unless men shall organize it." What are we going to do with the women who have been organizing and carrying it on heretofore? Are we to throw them aside? That is exactly what this provision does under the ruling of the Chair on the point of order made by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. President, the only thing we can do is to bide our time, as we did previous to the last election, and wait until we may have an opportunity to appeal to the judgment of the American people. We got very comforting results the last time. We will undertake to get better results the next time; and the women of America, who will know about this provision here, will resent your action to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Committee on Appropriations and the Republican Party, to which the Senator refers, are not worried about what action will be taken upon this amendment. The people of America know very well that there is a way of reaching this matter by introducing a bill in Congress, letting it go through the regular form, and amending the law if it is necessary. It can be discussed at that time; and I want to say to the Senator from Alabama that until the Senator from Mississippi rose upon his feet to-day I have not heard a word, not a single syllable, in complaint of the law—not one.

Mr. HEFLIN. It has just been discovered.

Mr. SMOOT. The same law was upon the statute books during all the time that the Senator's party was in power, and not a word was ever said.

Mr. HEFLIN. Not at all. The Senator from Mississippi has called attention to the fact that complaints have been made about how this provision is operating.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say that they had not. I said the Senator from Mississippi was the first one that I had ever heard mention it, and I think the Senator from Mississippi is the first one that the Senator from Alabama ever heard mention it; and I doubt whether there is a Senator in this Chamber, outside of the Senator from Mississippi, who has heard one word of complaint in relation to the expenditure of that money. It does seem to me that when the Government of the United States appropriates money to be expended in the States it ought to have something to say about how it shall be expended.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, evidently I did not make myself very plain. No doubt it was my fault. I said there was no cause for complaint heretofore, because they had mutually agreed upon it. The only thing I am trying to avoid is the threatened revolutionary change; that is all.

In respect to the proposition that the first time the Senator from Alabama had ever heard it was when I spoke of it, I think the Senator was in conference with some 8 or 10 Senators from the section which in part I represent when a high official from the South came and told us about this proposed change and made complaint. I think the Senator was there. The conference was held out here. Whether other Senators want to speak up about it or not, I do not know. The complaint came not only from my own State but from the State of a Senator near by; so I am merely trying to effect a change here that I think is important.

I have no fault to find, however, with the ruling of the Chair on the proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not a word of complaint to make against the Senator from Mississippi for what he said; but, as usual, every day the Senator from Alabama rises upon the floor and tries to make politics of everything. It is not one day in a week, you know; sometimes it is three or four times a day, and there is not any question but that it is twisted and turned for that purpose. It would be all right if there were anything in it; but there is no politics in this, and the Senator making the point of order was absolutely correct.

If we are going to allow legislation upon appropriation bills, where are we going to stop? Are we going to confine it to the Senator from Alabama? Is he the only one who shall have the privilege of putting legislation upon an appropriation bill? If we accept one such amendment, it does seem to me that it would be unfair not to accept them all and let them go to conference.

The members of the Committee on Appropriations have a duty to perform, and these rules were made in order that the appropriation bills may at least have a chance of getting through at every session of Congress under the rules. If we did not have this rule, I will say to the Senator, legislation would not be drawn in the orderly way of introducing a bill in the House or the Senate and passing it and letting the other House act upon it, but it would be simmered down to legislation on appropriation bills. That is where it would land.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator know whether the Senator from Alabama or any of these other critics have introduced any bill to be passed upon by the Department of Agriculture correcting the alleged evils of which they complain?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I have never seen one of them. Not only that but I have not even heard of it, as I have already said. Not a syllable has even been said upon the floor of the Senate before in regard to it.

Mr. HARRISON. Has the Senator finished?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. I was just waiting until the Senator concluded his remarks.

Mr. HEFLIN. Has the Senator finished?

Mr. SMOOT. I can finish at any time, or I can proceed, but I do not want to take the time of the Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to take some time as soon as the Senator gets through.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly aware of that. That does not alarm me at all. That is just as natural as that the sun will rise to-morrow morning.

I want to say, however, on behalf of the members of the committee, that there are no sectional prejudices in this action. This does not apply to one State. The law is general, applying to all the States in the Union; and I do not believe that Congress is ready to say that all of the money appropriated here to be expended in the States by our Government shall go into the States and be expended just as some one in the States thinks it ought to be. During the eight years that the Democratic Party were in power here you never heard any objections to the laws as to the Government having the administration of Federal appropriations to be expended in the States. You never heard anyone upon this side of the Chamber complaining because they were in the minority and the money was expended by the administration in power. Far be it from this side of the Chamber to undertake to make politics out of a question of that kind.

I will say to the Senator from Alabama that, as a member of the Appropriations Committee, if I had the bill in charge I would not make points of order against legislation coming from him any quicker than I would against legislation coming from any other Senator in the Chamber.

I would not care what side of the Chamber it came from; if the policy was adopted that points of order should be made against changing the law, or against new legislation upon appropriation bills, I would show no favoritism, and I think the Senator from Alabama knows that. The appropriation bill for the Interior Department passed the Senate the other day. There were at least 8 or 10 amendments against which I was compelled to make points of order. Most of them came from this side of the Chamber, but that made no difference to me. It is a matter of policy; and I want the Senate to understand that as far as the members of the Appropriations Committee are concerned—I do not mean on this side of the Chamber; I mean members of the Appropriations Committee on the Democratic side of the Chamber—they believe in that policy, and have supported the committee now as the Republican members supported the committee when the Democrats were in the majority.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I thought I would get a rise out of the Senator from Utah. I am very glad to have him participate in this debate.

The Senator says that no complaint was made about this expenditure during the Democratic administration. That is exactly the point I am making. The Democratic Party ran these things in a way to accomplish the most good to the people. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] has called attention to suggestions coming up from the various States against the provision that he is trying to amend, showing where evil is going to come from it, and I am trying to keep this thing from happening; and while I was discussing the matter, or attempting to discuss it, the Chair ruled that the amendment was not in order. So it is a hopeless proposition so far as amending this provision is concerned. The Senator from Mississippi made a very convincing statement as to the reason for this amendment. The Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from South Dakota, two Republicans, have made arguments in favor of it; but the Senator from Utah says that the Senator from Alabama wants to turn this thing into politics. Ours is a political Government and run by political parties. Politics is supposed to be the science of government. The dictionary tells us that a politician is supposed to be one who understands the science of government; and if this is a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people, we never are going to carry out that policy and keep that principle in view unless those who are sent here by the people fight for principles that will do that thing. That is what I am undertaking to do.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator feels that I have done him a wrong, I assure him now that I will never call him a politician again under the definition that was just given.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, it does not make any difference to me whether the Senator from Utah thinks I am a politician or not. I hope that I do understand something of the science of government; I have given a great deal of study to the subject, and the Senator from Utah is going to hear me many a time discuss issues in this Chamber that affect the rights and liberties of the American people.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, I know that.

Mr. HEFLIN. And I am not ever going to consult the Senator from Utah as to when I shall rise in my place in this Chamber and speak regarding the reprehensible conduct of the Republican Party, of which he is a member. I antagonize that party and its oppressive policies. I am a Democrat, and I believe that the Republican Party to-day, as it is administering the affairs of this Government, is enriching the favored few and impoverishing the many of the Nation. As long as I believe that, I shall continue to antagonize his party.

The Senator gets up and says that the Senator from Alabama rises here about once every day, and sometimes two or three times a day. If I should rise every time the Republican Party leaders do something that should be criticized and condemned, I would be on my feet all the time; but the Senator from Utah, who seems to get nettled and worried because some Democrat applies the lash to his party in this Chamber, has wasted time if he thinks he can silence me with anything of that kind.

Now while the Senator is in the Chamber I am going to propound to him a question that is of vital importance to the American people. He is sitting day after day on the debt commission negotiating about a debt involving $4,000,000,000 to the American people, Democrats and Republicans alike, and I have been contending on this floor for Democratic representation upon that commission. I ask him now—he evaded the question the other day—if he thinks it is right and just that Democrats should have representation on that commission?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I have no objection whatever to having Democratic representation on the commission, and I think there will be no question about it, as far as that is concerned, when the law is proposed to be changed. I will say to the Senator right now that no human being can settle the debts under the law existing to-day. A request will be made, I hope, for the modification of the law; and, as far as I am concerned, at the time that request is made I am perfectly willing to ask for an increase of the membership of the commission.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just one moment?

Mr. HEFLIN. Briefly. I do not want to take up very much of the time of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to ask the Senator from Utah, since he has referred to his connection with this commission, and the fact that there will be a proposal, perhaps, to modify the law, whether he would favor a modification of the present law before imparting to the Senate and Congress exactly what proposal has been made by the British Debt Commission?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, no. At the very time that a change in the law is proposed the information certainly will be given to Congress.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator feel that it would be better for the proposed settlement of these negotiations to be imparted to the public and the Congress of the United States, rather than to conduct all of the negotiations in secret, as is now being done?

Mr. SMOOT. No; but I do not believe it would be possible to get anywhere, not only in this country but in foreign lands as well, if everything that was said in that negotiation were made public each day.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not mean that, necessarily. I can see the position the Senator takes, and it has merit in it to some extent. But up to date it appears that no proposal made by the British for the purpose of the settlement of this debt has been imparted to the public, substantially or otherwise. Every day we see in the papers that the British have "laid their cards on the table," yet the public knows nothing in the world about what cards are being played.

Mr. SMOOT. I will inform the Senator what those cards are. That means that they are laying upon the table their financial condition as it exists to-day. They say, "This is the budget we are compelled to have. Under the law we can raise only so much, as the amount of taxes necessary to be collected in England to-day means that every man, woman, and child in England has to pay $100 a year in taxes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have not time to go into a discussion of that now.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator yield for me to submit a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not ask the Senator from Alabama to yield. I was simply answering a question asked by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not want to take the Senator off the floor, but I do not want to have so much of my time taken up.

Mr. McKELLAR. After the Senator from Alabama gets through I want to ask the Senator from Utah a question.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator brought the question up himself. I did not want to take any of the Senator's time.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate on the pending bill be extended to 1 o'clock.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator will permit me, I will explain why I make the request. Day before yesterday I was proceeding with an argument, as it might be termed by some, by others perhaps not so. I did not finish my remarks, and intended to proceed yesterday. I had several amendments to offer. I offered no amendment yesterday because of the discussion of other Senators, many other amendments being proposed.

Yesterday afternoon, before the recess was taken, Senators expressed a desire to finish the consideration of the bill last evening. I had no objection to the Senate meeting to-day at 11 o'clock, but I asked permission that the debate close at half past 12, so that I might this morning get out of my system some of the ideas which I have been holding for some three or four days with respect to this bill, and in order that I might present my amendments. I have not had time this morning, and only 44 minutes are left. There will naturally be other discussion this morning, and there should be. I have no objection in the world to it. I merely desire to present an amendment and argument which I think is of great importance, and I ask that the time be extended to 1 o'clock.

Mr. McNARY. Did not the Senator from Mississippi get the floor at 11 o'clock this morning?

Mr. HARRISON. I offered an amendment, but it was not an important amendment, and I did not make the argument I have wanted to make.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator had the floor, and there was opportunity for him to present his argument. He sat down, and gave the floor to another.

Mr. HARRISON. I withdraw my request.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield for a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the Senator, Who is preventing the Senator from Mississippi from offering his amendment and occupying the floor this morning?

Mr. HARRISON. There has been argument on both sides, and very legitimate argument. That is all right, and I have no fault to find with it; but I have an amendment I desire to present and to argue when I get an opportunity. It is not an unreasonable request I make, that the time be extended to 1 o'clock, but if there is objection to it, well and good.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I will consume but very little more time. There is a suggestion in what the Senator from Utah said that somebody on the part of this commission has disclosed that this debt matter can not be settled in the way in which it is now restricted by Congress. That would indicate that hope is held out to the envoys of Great Britain to just go on and baby this thing along, and that perhaps additional powers will be granted. I do not know what is going on, but I have a right to know, as everybody in America has a right to know what is going on in those negotiations.

Mr. President, here is what the headlines in the Post of this morning say:

Britain may remit on debt annually. Commissioners give attention to plan.

They are negotiating now, but nobody representing millions of Democrats in America is on that commission.

May reach terms discussion Monday.

They are about to come to some sort of an agreement it seems. Does the Senator from Utah wish us to have representation on this commission after they have made an agreement with Great Britain? What is it that postpones action upon the part of Congress looking to putting Democrats upon this commission?

Another line in the Post:

Administration expects no difficulty in obtaining Congress's approval for terms fixed.

Mr. President, I do not know whether, when the envoys of Great Britain, speaking for their country, say, "We would like to have this done" and "We would like to have that done," our commissioners tell them, "We can not do that under the terms of our authority. It may be we can get those terms changed."

Mr. President, I can not understand why anybody would stand in the way of immediately acting upon this question of putting a commission into this negotiation representative of the whole American people, and not a one-sided commission composed only of partisan Republicans. When I asked the Senator from Utah about this thing before he said he did not want to contribute to a filibuster. To-day he says that personally he would not object to having some Democrats on the commission after certain other steps have been taken. That is the substance of his position and of what he said. I suppose he wants us to wait until the thing is settled. I can only protest against this sort of thing. I can stand in my place here and demand what is right. I may not be able to get it at the hands of the majority, but that does not keep me from saying what I think ought to be done, and standing for what I believe is right and just and fair in the premises; and that is what I am doing to-day and shall continue to do.

I am not going to take any more time. My friend from Mississippi has some amendments he wants to present, and I have said all I wanted to say upon this subject at this time.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator withhold that just a moment?

Mr. FLETCHER. I withhold it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I think we ought to have more Senators here, however. Only a handful has been here this morning, and I make the point of no quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. LADD. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is detained on official business in attendance on a committee of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to have read at this time the amendment which I shall propose in a few moments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The READING CLERK. Insert at the proper place the following:

That hereafter the Bureau of the Budget shall not reduce the estimate submitted to it by the Department of Agriculture, for appropriations for said department without submitting with its recommendations to the President the reasons given by the Department of Agriculture for its estimate, and the reasons of the Bureau of the Budget for the reduction, which reasons shall be transmitted by the President with the Budget to Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. The amendment which I shall propose when I conclude discussing it would make the law provide that when the Department of Agriculture makes an estimate and it is reduced by the Bureau of the Budget, there shall be transmitted by the President to the Congress the reasons upon the part of the Budget for the reduction, together with the reasons of the Department of Agriculture for its estimates.

Mr. President, I have nothing but the kindliest feeling and most generous expressions of feeling for General Lord, the head of the Bureau of the Budget. No doubt he is performing the duties of the office well and doing the very best he can. No doubt he measures up in high degree to the requirements of the office. I indorse the many expressions of praise concerning him which have been indulged in by Senators since we began consideration of the pending bill. It is the system and the way in which it is being operated with which I find fault. More than that, I find fault with the rules of the Senate which restrict full consideration of these questions and restrain us from offering amendments which should be offered to care properly for the needs of the farmers.

I think the way the Budget system is being operated is different from that contemplated by those who fathered it. It was to act as an agent for the President in procuring information. It was never dreamed that appropriations necessary for the farmers of the country or for any other industry or class or agency of the Government should not be adequately provided. If any champion of the Budget system, when the measure was being ushered through this Chamber and the House, had said that the Director of the Budget would be given power to cut the estimates of the Department of Agriculture without rhyme or reason and would be permitted to carry that reduction through without giving the reason to the Congress, the measure never would have passed the Congress of the United States.

The power that was vested in the Congress under the Constitution, by virtue of the way the Budget law is being administered, has been taken away from the Congress. Under the present rules of the Senate and the operation of the Budget system what right have I, what privilege have I, to offer an amendment upon the floor of the Senate to increase an appropriation in a general appropriation bill, no matter how great may be the need that is intended to be cared for by the increased appropriation? I am estopped from it. I can not do it. In other words, in one man in the Budget Bureau is vested the sole power of saying what shall be the amount of the appropriations for certain services in the various branches of the Government.

Of course, the committee having the matter in charge may increase the amount and bring it before the Senate in the bill, but an individual Senator, who is not so fortunate as to be a member of the committee, can have no part in it. He can not offer an amendment and get consideration of it, because the point of order can be made under the antiquated rules of the Senate, and the matter can not be considered. We have seen question after question brought forward since the beginning of the consideration of the bill but debate stopped and an increase in the appropriation withheld because of the system that is in force in the Budget Bureau and under the rules of the Senate. Why, some one said the other day, when we had an amendment to increase an appropriation, "Did the Department of Agriculture estimate for it? Did they appeal to the Senate to grant that increase?" "No, they did not do it." Why? Here is the reason. I read from the Budget law:

No estimate or request for an appropriation and no request for an increase in an item of any such estimate or request, and no recommendation as to how the revenue needs of the Government should be met, shall be submitted to Congress or any committee thereof by any officer or employee or any department or establishment unless at the request of either House of Congress.

That is not all. Under the Budget system an order issued by the President of the United States reads as follows:

To all the heads of the departments and the employees:

Before any request or recommendation of this character originating in or specified for any executive department or independent establishment of the Government is sent to either House of Congress or to any committee thereof, it shall first be submitted to the Director of the Budget, who shall make recommendations with respect thereto to the President, and no such request shall be submitted to either House of Congress or to any committee thereof without having first been approved by the President. When so approved the request or recommendation to either House of Congress or to any committee thereof shall recite the fact that such approval has been obtained.

Why, last year when the Agricultural Department appropriation bill was being considered, Doctor Ball, a very splendid gentleman and competent official from the Department of Agriculture, was before the committee answering questions. We found that when the Department of Agriculture submitted its estimate to the Bureau of the Budget, a party who had been, as has been stated already upon the floor of the House, manager of the La Salle Hotel in Chicago, was designated by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget to go over the estimates and to cut them, and they were cut some $3,000,000, I believe. Then they were submitted to Congress. Of course, General Dawes, who was then Director of the Budget, could not look at all the items. He had to designate some one to look them over, so he designated this former manager of the La Salle Hotel, who knew nothing about farmers and their needs, to cut the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Are the American people going to approve of a policy that will disregard the views and the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, composed of men qualified and specially designated to study the needs of agriculture, when they have cut to the bone the estimates for appropriations for the department to take care of the needs of agriculture? Are they going to stand for the Congress of the United States then to allow some man who knows nothing whatsoever of agriculture, who has been the manager of the Hotel La Salle in Chicago, to cut the estimates for appropriation for the Department of Agriculture from $2,000,000 to $3,000,000? Then what? A man elected by the people of a State to represent them here upon the floor of the Senate, if he is not so fortunate as to be a member of the Committee on Appropriations, can not even offer an amendment suggesting that the recommendations or estimates by the Department of Agriculture should be appropriated for to carry out the needs of that particular industry.

That is the situation in which we are placed. We have turned over the running of the Government to the Director of the Budget. That might be all right, although I do not agree to it, but he can not run the whole Government himself. It is a physical impossibility. So he directs individuals here and there to cut down the expenditures of the various departments. I say to you, sirs, it never was the intention of Congress, when we passed the Budget law, that the Budget could go ahead and cut down estimates when the estimates of the department were based upon reason and upon the needs of the country.

The bill now before us has been prepared in the same way. The Director of the Budget, General Lord, splendid man that he is, fine and competent as he is, has done the same thing with reference to this bill. It was once said here that General Dawes was the one man qualified in all these United States to be Director of the Budget. Now it has been said just yesterday by the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that General Lord is the only man in the United States qualified to be Director of the Budget.

But what has General Lord done? He directed an individual to take the estimates prepared by the experts in the Department of Agriculture and, after the experts had submitted estimates which were $200,000 less than the amount carried in the appropriation bill for the Department of Agriculture last year, he said, "Cut them $2,000,000 more." He compelled them to cut out $2,000,000 more. Consequently, the Bureau of the Budget hands us a bill, giving no reasons for the reductions, which carries $2,000,000 less appropriations than were carried in the last bill making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture.

We have shown, time after time, in the consideration of the bill that the Bureau of the Budget was wrong with reference to certain cuts which were made. I know of no cut in this bill that it has made which any Senator upon the floor of the Senate has approved or indorsed. Indeed, the Committee on Agriculture in no less than a score of instances increased the amounts that were estimated for by the Bureau of the Budget and recommended the amount that had been estimated by the Department of Agriculture.

But, some one has said, "Why did not the Department of Agriculture come before the committee and ask for the amounts for which they had estimated?" It was because they were afraid they would violate the law if they asked for them. Indeed, the law is specific that when the estimates have been submitted to the Bureau of the Budget, if the head of the department should come to Congress and request an increase over the amount approved by the Budget he would be subject to penalties. Statements have been issued and orders have gone forth giving the employees and the heads of the departments and bureaus of the Government to understand that if they try to influence an increase in the amount of an appropriation above the estimates indorsed by the Bureau of the Budget their political heads would be snapped off.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I will yield in just a moment. How in the world is one of the committees that is trying to provide adequately for the needs of the country—be it for the Navy, be it for the Army, be it for commerce, be it for mining or agriculture—going to find the true facts when the heads of the departments are afraid to come before the committees, because of the law and because of the injunctions and inhibitions that have been placed upon them by Executive orders and statements, to plead with the committee, to explain to the committee, to ask for more money, or to give any reason for the request?

I yield now to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. If the head of a department deliberately and willfully violates a law, does not the Senator from Mississippi think he ought to be removed as the head of that department?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Wisconsin now states, and he bears out what I have been saying, that the heads of the departments, if they violate the law, should lose their jobs.

Mr. LENROOT. I do. Does not the Senator also think so?

Mr. HARRISON. I would not construe the law as going so far as the President of the United States has construed it, nor so far as the Senator from Wisconsin construes it.

Mr. CARAWAY and Mr. LENROOT addressed the Chair.

Mr. HARRISON. One moment. If the Budget Bureau reduces an appropriation from the amount estimated by the Department of Agriculture or by any other department, if I were President of the United States—and I think the President could take such action under the law—and there were no other way, I would issue an Executive order stating that the reasons assigned for the reduction should be transmitted with the report to Congress, and the reasons for the estimate given to the Budget Bureau by the respective departments should also be transmitted to Congress.

Mr. LENROOT. That is not the point. The Senator from Mississippi has said that he complains of the order which prevented heads of departments from violating the law.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I am complaining about the law in that respect.

Mr. LENROOT. That is a very different thing.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. If I am not mistaken, the very words read by the Senator from Mississippi from the Budget law were contained in the Budget bill which was considered by the Senate when the Senator's party was in power.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not going to bring politics into this matter. I trust General Lord. I said, perhaps, the Senator was right on yesterday in his laudation of him. I do not blame Secretary of Agriculture Wallace. He has done the very best he could. His hands are tied. I have no doubt if Secretary Wallace could have his way many of these appropriations would be increased. He understands the needs and situation. I am not bringing politics into this discussion, but I am trying to impress upon the Senate the needs of agriculture in this country, and that we should not be hamstrung here and restrained from a full consideration of an amendment when the needs of the country demand an increased appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Mississippi must know that whatever restrictions there may be upon one department are placed upon all the departments.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course.

Mr. SMOOT. And the Senator, if he has studied budget laws, knows that there is no budget in any country in the world in which the restrictions are not severer than those imposed in our Budget law.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; but those governments are autocracies, while here we have a democracy. Here the Senate and House of Representatives are supposed to legislate for the people, and we are supposed to pass appropriation bills in order to take care of the needs of the Government. The powers should not all be placed in the hands of the Director of the Budget Bureau, as it is to-day. The Director of the Budget is an appointive officer; we are elected by the people and answerable to the people.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, that is a question of policy.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Utah, of course, is fortunate, for he is an influential and powerful member of the Committee on Appropriations. He can sit around the mahogany table and secure amendments to increase appropriations for his people, but some of us who are modest Members of the Senate, who have no influence or power here, can not get into the room of the Committee on Appropriations with a crowbar, and consequently our voices can not be lifted or votes cast there. We are not so fortunately situated as is the Senator. Has the Senator from Utah ever thought about that?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I have thought of it a great many times, and as a member of the Committee on Appropriations I have hesitated to propose any kind of amendments to appropriation bills. I should have been before the Committee on Appropriations a great many more times asking for increased appropriations if I had not been a member of the committee. If the Senator from Mississippi had been observant since he has been a Member of the Senate he would have observed that the Senator from Utah has not been asking for increases in appropriations.

Mr. CARAWAY. But he has got all that he desired.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Arkansas, of course, always has something to say about everything. He now states that the Senator from Utah has got all he desired.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator had not obtained all he desired would he not have been asking for it?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I would not.

Mr. CARAWAY. He is a queer man.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah desires to be treated just the same as every other Senator is treated, and not differently.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire now to read from the hearings when Doctor Ball was before the Committee on Appropriations last year. At that time questions were put to him touching certain items, and he was asked to give reasons for certain action. He replied that he did not feel that he should take such action, and could not do it under this order. When Doctor Ball stated that he should be embarrassed to do so, the following colloquy occurred. I read from the hearings:

Senator OVERMAN. Would you feel embarrassed in submitting representation to this committee as to items in the estimates, notwithstanding the action of the Budget?

Doctor BALL. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Why would you feel embarrassed?
Doctor BALL. I am sorry I did not bring that order with me.
Senator OVERMAN. I asked you to bring that order down here.
Doctor BALL. Yes; because, according to that order the executive departments are notified that they should not make representations above the approval of the Budget; and where these representations are made that they should be accompanied by a statement of the attitude of the Budget Bureau and of the President on that particular item.

There it is. We are foreclosed from even obtaining reasons for the appropriations for agriculture which have been reduced by the Budget Bureau. I requested in reference to certain items in this bill the reasons which were assigned by the Department of Agriculture for the estimate, but I was told that there were none before the Committee on Appropriations; that I could not have the information. Why? Because the department is not going to furnish it to me. They are afraid that they will violate the law; they are afraid they will violate the order that went down from the President to the effect that the head of any department or bureau who should bring his influence to bear to bring about or who should request an increase of appropriations over those made by the Budget should be removed. The Budget Bureau gives us no reasons for their estimates; and the reasons for the estimates of the Department of Agriculture are not before the committee. So what are we to do? We must accept, so to speak, without rhyme or reason, what the Budget Bureau says.

When the question is put to the representative of the Department of Agriculture, "Why did you not request an amount in excess of the amount the Bureau of the Budget allowed?" he replies, as Doctor Ball replied in the quotation which I have read, "I am afraid it would embarrass the Secretary of Agriculture; the order has gone forth that we can not request an increase or use our influence to increase the amount recommended by the Bureau of the Budget."

I showed, Mr. President, day before yesterday at least 15 cases where the Budget Bureau had reduced, and in many instances greatly reduced, certain items for agriculture. I shall not delay the Senate by citing many of the instances which I have here, but will refer to a few of them. The Bureau of the Budget made reductions in the items for improvement of methods of crop production, horticultural investigations, maintenance of roads for national parks, prevention of the sale of deleterious foods, and soil investigations. On that one item alone the estimate was decreased by $48,000 by the Bureau of the Budget.

I refer also to the item to investigate insects affecting fruits, which was decreased by the Bureau of the Budget; to the item for investigations of insects affecting truck crops; the item relative to the conservation of food from wild animals, which was greatly reduced by the Budget Bureau, and so on down the line. I have not been able to ascertain the total amount of the reductions made by the Bureau of the Budget in items of this character below the estimates of the Agricultural Department, but it is somewhere between $1,000,000 and $2,000,000.

Is this a time for appropriations to be made that do not answer to the needs of agriculture? At this time when the farmers of the great Middle West and certain parts of the South are suffering as they have never suffered before because of reduced prices for their products, should they now receive at the hands of Congress reductions in many items contained in the Agricultural appropriation bill? It is a good time, perhaps, to reduce appropriations for the Navy and for the Army and for many other branches of the Government service, but I say that it is not a time to refuse to provide adequate appropriations to fight insects affecting the farmers' crops, to conserve the food supply from wild animals, and for numerous other purposes which I have indicated to the Senate.

The Agricultural Department is not to blame; it is the Budget Bureau that is to blame. I do not blame the President of the United States so much, for he can not go over the numerous reports and study them himself, but must rely upon the men who are designated to carry on the work. There has been placed in the hands of the Budget Bureau too much power.

There are two remedies which will solve the difficulty. One is to adopt an amendment such as I have proposed, not only as to the Agricultural Department but as to the other departments, and the other is to change the rules of the Senate so that an individual Senator may offer an amendment to increase an appropriation where an estimate has been made by one of the departments of the Government for the appropriation; indeed, personally I would go beyond that and say that a Senator shall have a right to offer an amendment to an appropriation bill increasing the amount carried, notwithstanding any limitation or restriction placed upon such action by the estimate of a department of the Government, because in our hands is lodged originally the power to make appropriations and to legislate for the country. To-day we can not do so; we can receive the report of the Bureau of the Budget and without protest must accept that report. I now offer my amendment, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator desire to speak to the amendment?

Mr. McNARY. I merely wish to make the point of order against the amendment upon the ground that it proposes legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator desires to discuss the amendment, of course I will yield to him; but if he does not, I should like to say before the point of order is ruled on that we were told when the Budget system was adopted that it would do away with deficiency appropriations; indeed, in a speech made by General Dawes, a splendid man, a fine official, who performed a great service, no doubt, it was stated:

The report of the Director of the Budget indicates that the Executive can maintain, through agencies of coordination, an effective control over expenditures which will substantially eliminate the occasion for deficiency appropriations. * * * From early in the administration the Executive set his face against deficiency appropriations, and an Executive order was issued discountenancing them.

In that speech General Dawes gave the impression that under the Budget system we would see very few, if any, deficiency appropriation bills in the future. Yet in the short time which has intervened since the adoption of the Budget system I find we have passed seven deficiency appropriation bills. The first was passed on June 16, 1921, and carried $106,000,000. Perhaps the Bureau of the Budget had nothing to do with that, because that bill was passed a few days after the Budget law had been enacted; but we were told that the inauguration of the Budget system would probably prevent the necessity for the enactment of other deficiency bills. Yet there was passed on August 24, 1921, the urgent deficiency bill appropriating $50,000,000; on December 15, 1921, a deficiency bill appropriating $105,000,000; on March 20, 1922, a deficiency bill appropriating $137,000,000; on July 1, 1922, a deficiency bill appropriating $47,000,000; on September 22, 1922, a deficiency bill appropriating $2,500,000; and within the last few days there has been passed by the House and Senate, although it has not as yet been approved by the President, a deficiency bill appropriating $75,000,000. The total of the deficiency appropriations to which I have referred will run in the neighborhood of a half billion dollars, although we were told by General Dawes and the champions of the Budget system who are now administering it that it would do away with deficiency appropriations.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. In reference to the deficiency bills to which the Senator has referred, let me say that the last one, for instance, which he quotes, is made up almost entirely of appropriations to provide for judgments of courts and for the settlement of audited accounts, these accounts representing money that has gone back into the Treasury at the end of the second fiscal year and can only become again available after it has been appropriated or reappropriated. Also, in the last deficiency bill over $42,000,000 was to refund taxes illegally collected; and $25,000,000 was for road building. Of course, when Congress, after the annual appropriation bills have been enacted, passes a new law requiring an appropriation of $20,000,000 or $50,000,000, or whatever the amount may be, the only way to take care of the necessary expenditure is through what are called deficiency bills. That is the only method by which expenditures under legislation enacted subsequent to the passage of the annual appropriation bills may be provided for. That is all there is to that.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely called attention to the matter to indicate that the law has not worked as well as we thought it would.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator knows that there has been scarcely a time, certainly not in the last 35 years, when we have had a session without the necessity of passing some deficiency bills.

Mr. HARRISON. There is no question about that.

Mr. WARREN. The War Department, in the settlement of claims, has had this hang over after the war, the settlement of judgments, and so forth, which has increased these amounts.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and it shows that the policy of cutting down these appropriations in the general bill, and then supplying them later with deficiency appropriations, does not save anything in particular.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time has arrived when, under the unanimous-consent agreement, debate must cease.

Mr. HARRISON. I offer the amendment.

Mr. McNARY. I renew the point of order.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask that the amendment may be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 82, after line 14, it is proposed to insert:

That hereafter the Bureau of the Budget shall not reduce the estimate submitted to it by the Department of Agriculture for appropriations for said department without submitting with its recommendations to the President the reasons given by the Department of Agriculture for its estimate, and reasons of the Bureau of the Budget for the reduction, which reasons shall be transmitted by the President with the Budget to Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is well taken. The proposed legislation is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed it will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7658) to amend the act approved August 25, 1919, entitled "An act for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13559) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes; that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the said bill numbered 1, 2, 30, 37, and 53, and agreed to the same; and that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 31 and 36, and had agreed to the same each with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 13696) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

He also laid before the Senate a report from the Alien Property Custodian, in response to Senate Resolution 399, agreed to January 6, 1923, concerning automobiles owned and operated by the office of the Alien Property Custodian, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LADD presented the petition of Alan Flowers and 72 other citizens of Williams County, N. Dak., praying for the passage of legislation stabilizing prices of farm products, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BALL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 1678) for the relief of Edith B. Macon, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1006) thereon.

AMENDMENT OF DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STANLEY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $13,600 for grading Linnean Avenue from Military Road to the grade point south of Albemarle Street, $3,900 for grading Albemarle Street between Twenty-ninth Street and the grade point west of Broad Branch Road, $1,650 for widening the fill on Albemarle Street near Connecticut Avenue so as to provide sidewalks, and $1,250 for grading Brandywine Street between Twenty-ninth Street and Linnean Avenue, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 13660, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

RURAL-CREDIT FACILITIES.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4280) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States; to amend the Federal reserve act; to amend the Federal farm loan act; to extend and stabilize the market for United States bonds and other securities; to provide fiscal agents for the United States, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives receding from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 30, 37, and 53 to the bill (H. R. 13559) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, and concurring therein; receding from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and concurring therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert: "The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to establish and maintain the former Fort Apache military post as an Indian boarding school for the purpose of carrying out treaty obligations, to be known as the Theodore Roosevelt Indian School. For support and education of 350 pupils, including pay of superintendent, $70,000; for repairs, remodeling, and improvement, $17,800; for purchase of equipment, $17,500; in all, $105,300, to be immediately available: Provided, That the Fort Apache military post, and land appurtenant thereto, shall remain in the possession and custody of the Secretary of the Interior so long as they shall be required for Indian school purposes," and receding from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 36, and concurring therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert: ", such other papers when reproduced for sale to be sold at not less than cost plus 10 per cent."

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate numbered 31 and 36.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. That completes the bill.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 13696) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 13593) making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with and that the bill may be read for action on the committee amendments first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NITRATE OF SODA.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I desire to take this occasion to see if I can not get action upon a measure of urgent importance.

I have in charge a joint resolution which is of exactly the same nature as the joint resolution that I introduced and had passed in 1917 and 1918 appropriating $10,000,000 for the purpose of authorizing the President to purchase, under our Government contract, nitrate of soda in Chile, to bring it in Government vessels to this country, and to distribute it, for cash in advance, to the farmers who are now trying to make some cotton under boll-weevil conditions. I have conferred with Secretary Wallace and with others, and they assure me that if we are going to take any action at all, it should be done now.

I should like to state to the Senate that under the rules and regulations adopted by the President not a penny was lost. Every dollar, of course, was paid back immediately upon the delivery of the soda. In other words, the checks are gathered throughout the country through the Federal agents, deposited in the banks, and the Government simply uses this amount and purchases according to the orders.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether the joint resolution has been reported?

Mr. SMITH. It has been reported unanimously favorably from the committee. We operated under it in 1917 and 1918, and it is absolutely essential that this shall be done if we are to make any cotton at all under boll-weevil conditions.

Mr. WARREN. I am making no objection, except that I assume the Senator will withdraw it if it leads to any extended debate.

Mr. SMITH. Yes. I desire to get action on the part of the Senate, because Secretary Wallace has investigated the operation of the joint resolution in the two years that we had it and not a penny was lost. It can not be, because the joint resolution provides that the nitrate of soda shall be delivered for cash in advance.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the peculiar parliamentary situation is that we have the unfinished business, namely, the shipping bill; we have a report on the farm credits bill that we are waiting to take up; and I have come in here by unanimous consent, laying aside the regular order, with the Post Office appropriation bill. I should have no objection so far as I am concerned, if the joint resolution referred to by the Senator from South Carolina can be passed without debate.

Mr. HEFLIN. There will be no debate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not believe that I would be justified in yielding if there is to be a discussion. As far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the joint resolution, and if the Senator assures me that it can be passed without debate I will very willingly yield to him for that purpose; but if there should be debate—and it occurs to me that with an appropriation of $10,000,000 it is quite likely to lead to debate—then I shall ask to proceed with this appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH. I have talked to those on the other side who are as deeply interested as I am in this matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President could we not agree that if the joint resolution is not disposed of in an hour or half an hour, it will be withdrawn?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I should be willing to agree to that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There are probably Senators on the floor who know whether they are going to discuss the joint resolution or not, and they can give us some information as to whether we are going to have debate.

Mr. SMITH. I really do not think there will be any debate, because the joint resolution, as the Senator will see if he reads it, is so hedged about that it is impossible to lose a single penny. The President has the whole thing in charge, and the cash must be deposited in the several farming communities before the orders are filled.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask that the joint resolution be read, so that Senators can announce whether or not they are going to take time to debate it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 265) was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President is authorized and directed to procure, or aid in procuring, such stocks of nitrate of soda as he may determine to be necessary and find available for increasing agricultural production during the calendar year 1923, and to dispose of the same at cost, payable in advance. For carrying out the purposes of this joint resolution there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, available immediately and until expended, the sum of $10,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and the President is authorized to make such regulations and to use such means and agencies of the Government as in his discretion he may deem best. The proceeds arising from the disposition of the nitrate of soda may go into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts: Provided, That the sum herein appropriated and the proceeds arising from the disposition of the nitrate of soda may be used, at the discretion of the President, during the calendar year 1923 as a revolving fund for the purposes herein named.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think there will have to be an amendment to the joint resolution before it can pass. I call the Senator's attention to the wording on line 7.

Mr. WARREN. As it is a matter of unanimous consent, if the Senator will allow me, I think there will be no doubt that the joint resolution can be taken care of after the Post Office appropriation bill is considered and passed. I ask the proponent of the joint resolution if he would not be better satisfied to wait and let us get the appropriation bill out of the way, and then take up his measure?

Mr. SMITH. Secretary Wallace called me up this morning and told me that if he was to extend this aid to farmers he must begin to organize the work and get the ships ready, and so forth.

Mr. WARREN. We might spend an hour discussing the measure, in which time we could pass the appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH. Will the Senator from Wyoming allow the Senator from Utah to suggest the amendment he stated he thinks is necessary?

Mr. SMOOT. Rather than consume any time now, I will take it up directly with the Senator. I think the Senator and I can agree on the amendment I believe to be necessary, and then we can take up the joint resolution after the appropriation bill is out of the way.

Mr. SMITH. I do not want to delay the Senate, and no one can accuse me of having done anything but attempt to expedite the business of the Senate. But if we are to pass the joint resolution at all the earlier the better, because time is the essence of this thing.

Mr. SMOOT. We will pass it to-day.

Mr. SIMMONS. Can we not agree to vote right now, without further discussion, after the amendment is proposed?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think perhaps we had better proceed with the appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH. I am perfectly willing to go ahead with that, and perhaps we can get an opportunity later to-day to get the joint resolution through.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads a question. About how long does he think the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill will take?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think the Senator from Alabama would know more about that than I do. If there is no discussion on the bill except in regard to matters pertaining to the measure, I can see no reason why we should take more than a couple of hours to pass it. I want any item in the bill discussed which any Senator desires to discuss, but, of course, if Senators desire to debate other things and occupy the time, which they may do under the rules of the Senate, the chairman of the committee is unable even to guess how long it will take to dispose of the bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have no disposition to discuss this bill at length. Of course it will pass, and I think in a very short while. I do want to say now, however, that the joint resolution offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is of vast importance to the farmers of my State and to the farmers in all of the cotton-growing States.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understand, but if the Senator will let us proceed now, until the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Utah prepare the amendment, we may be able to get a vote immediately.

Mr. HEFLIN. Very well. With the understanding that we will immediately consider this joint resolution when we get through with the Post Office appropriation bill, I am willing that we proceed with the consideration of that bill. I just want to say a word or two in this connection about the resolution. A little more than four years ago we passed through Congress just such a resolution. It provided, as does this one, for the purchase by our Government of nitrate of soda from Chile, to be sold at cost to our farmers.

The Government, under the authority of the other resolution passed by Congress, purchased $10,000,000 worth of nitrate of soda and sold it at cost to our farmers. The Government rendered a great service to our farmers by that kindly act, and at the same time never lost a cent in the transaction. The purchase and sale of nitrate of soda contemplated in the Smith resolution will be conducted in the same way. Our farmers are in distress. They are not only suffering from the terrible effects of drastic deflation but they are being held up by the Fertilizer Trust and told that they must pay from $70 to $75 per ton for nitrate of soda to be used on their farms in 1923. Mr. President, I understand that the Government can purchase this $10,000,000 worth of nitrate of soda from Chile and deliver it in Government ships to our farmers for a little less than $45 a ton. So the passage of this resolution, which was unanimously reported from the Agricultural Committee, of which I am a member, will be the means of saving to our farmers in the cotton-growing States of from $25 to $30 per ton on their nitrate of soda supply for the year 1923. We must pass it this afternoon.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13593) making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). The Secretary will read the bill for action on the amendments of the committee.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 10, line 17, after the word "pay," to strike out "$107,452,600" and insert "for temporary and auxiliary clerk hire and for substitute clerk hire for clerks and employees absent with pay at first and second class post offices and temporary and auxiliary clerk hire at summer and winter resort post offices, $116,452,600: Provided, That $500,000 of this sum may be used in the employment of auxiliary and substitute clerks for the purpose of completing the work of determining the cost to the department of handling the different classes of mail matter," so as to read:

For compensation to clerks and employees at first and second class post offices, including substitutes for clerks and employees absent without pay, for temporary and auxiliary clerk hire, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 9, to strike out:

For temporary and auxiliary clerk hire and for substitute clerk hire for clerks and employees absent with pay at first and second class post offices and temporary and auxiliary clerk hire at summer and winter resort post offices, $8,500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, at the end of line 23, to increase the appropriation for miscellaneous items necessary and incidental to post offices of the first and second classes from "$800,000" to "$850,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 20, after the numerals "$1,500,000." to strike out the semicolon and the words "and in addition to this sum any unexpended balance of the appropriation for this purpose for the fiscal year 1923 is reappropriated and made available for the fiscal year 1924," so as to make the paragraph read:

For the operation and maintenance of the airplane mail service between New York, N. Y., and San Francisco, Calif., via Chicago, Ill., and Omaha, Nebr., including necessary incidental expenses and employment of necessary personnel, $1,500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 10, after the word "international," to strike out "registered, insured, and collect-on-delivery mail, in accordance with convention stipulations," and insert "mail in accordance with convention, treaty, or agreement stipulations," so as to make the paragraph read:

For payment of limited indemnity for the injury or loss of international mail in accordance with convention, treaty, or agreement stipulations, $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 6, after the word "boxes," to strike out "$1,122,000" and insert "$1,522,000," so as to read:

For miscellaneous equipment and supplies, including the purchase and repair of furniture, package boxes, posts, trucks, baskets, satchels, straps, letter-box paint, baling machines, perforating machines, duplicating machines, printing presses, directories, cleaning supplies, and the manufacture, repair, and exchange of equipment, the erection and painting of letter-box equipment, and for the purchase and repair of presses and dies for use in the manufacture of letter boxes; for post-marking, rating, money-order stamps, and electrotype plates and repairs to same; metal, rubber, and combination type, dates and figures, type holders, ink pads for canceling and stamping purposes, and for the purchase, exchange, and repair of typewriting machines, envelope-opening machines, and computing machines, copying presses, numbering machines, time recorders, letter balances, scales, test weights, and miscellaneous articles purchased and furnished directly to the Postal Service; for miscellaneous expenses in the preparation and publication of post-route maps and rural-delivery maps or blue prints, including tracing for photolithographic reproduction; for other expenditures necessary and incidental to post offices of the first, second, and third classes, and offices of the fourth class having or to have rural-delivery service, and for letter boxes, $1,522,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the items for miscellaneous equipment and supplies, on page 18, line 11, after the word "works," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That $500,000 of this appropriation may be used for the purchase of equipment and furniture for post-office quarters and for no other purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, at the end of line 12, to reduce the appropriation for vehicle allowance, the hiring of drivers, the rental of vehicles, and the purchase and exchange and maintenance, including stable and garage facilities, of wagons or automobiles for, and the operation of, screen-wagon and city delivery and collection service, from "$15,000,000" to "$14,500,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I desire to have inserted in the RECORD a letter which I have received from the First Assistant Postmaster General. I ought to say, in reference to this item, that the committee did not feel that it had sufficient information to warrant it in appropriating the fifteen million dollars; and I am not prepared now to say what ought to be done, so I have consented to the reduction of this appropriation by $500,000. But I wish this letter put in in order that the committee of conference may have it.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, January 12, 1923.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR TOWNSEND: Responding to the request of the subcommittee considering the Post Office appropriation bill for the ensuing fiscal year for information as to the growth in the expenditures for vehicular service since 1916, the following statement is substituted:

The appropriation and audited expenditures made therefrom during the fiscal year indicated were as follows:

Year.	Appropriated.	Audited expenditures.
1916	$5,510,000	$5,012,225
1917	5,585,819	5,584,224
1918	6,766,608	6,766,607
1919	9,200,000	9,099,733
1920	11,213,797	11,210,000
1921	15,750,000	15,167,000
1922	15,000,000	[1] 14,730,000
1923	15,000,000	[2] 15,600,000

[1] Audited amount plus outstanding bills chargeable to the appropriations.
[2] Estimated expenditures based on actual expenditures for five months ended Nov. 30.

The heavy increase in the volume of mail and the imperative necessity for providing transportation therefor, based on the experience during the first five months of the current fiscal year, shows that the existing appropriation of $15,000,000 will be exceeded by $123,848, without taking into account the added expense of operating trucks during the winter months. Based on the experience during the fiscal year 1922, it will require $392,504 additional to operate the motor-vehicle service during the winter period which is just beginning, severe weather having set in in the Northern States. As an indication of the additional burden that severe weather (a single severe storm, for instance) is liable to impose upon the vehicle-service appropriation, attention is invited to the snow and sleet storm in the city of New York during the month of February, 1920, when conditions were of such an adverse nature that the department borrowed from the Army 160 additional trucks of heavy tonnage, and at the same time expended in excess of $80,000 in 22 days for rented equipment. During the height of this storm, when practically all vehicular traffic, both truck and horse drawn, even including taxicab service, was suspended by commercial concerns, it was necessary for the Postal Service transportation to function; and it not only had to carry the normal volume of mail but also had to handle thousands of sacks of parcel post deposited in the post office by merchants for local delivery for the reason that they had withdrawn their equipment from active use as the result of the practically impassable condition of the streets. It is for emergencies of this nature that a small reserve must be provided.

The growth of the motor-vehicle service is indicated by the following table, which shows the number of cities motorized, beginning with July 1, 1917, together with the total number of trucks in operation:

Year.	Cities.	Trucks.
July 1, 1917	10	541
July 1, 1918	15	965
July 1, 1919	52	1,692
July 1, 1920	134	2,500
July 1, 1921	276	3,738
July 1, 1922	347	4,433

With respect to the foregoing, it should be stated that of the 347 cities having Government-owned service on July 1, 1922, 132 have one truck each and 98 have from two to five trucks each—230 cities having five trucks or less. In a large percentage of these cases the equipment now in use is the first vehicular delivery or collection service provided, the service prior to the authorization of the Government-owned trucks having been performed by carriers on foot.

Since July 1, 1922, 176 trucks have been added to the service and numerous requests are pending for additional equipment. In some instances these trucks were authorized to provide a small reserve equipment for the reason that the mail had increased to such an extent during the past few months that the trucks previously considered as reserve equipment had to be operated on regular schedules to prevent an accumulation of mail at mail-handling points. Some of the trucks were also issued to provide needed additional parcel-post delivery and collection service, as those branches of the service had also increased to such an extent that they could no longer be handled with the equipment available. It is the present practice when vehicle service is requested to ascertain the cost at which rented equipment can be obtained, and Government-owned trucks are authorized in those cases where it appears that they can be operated more economically than rented equipment.

The World War and the unusual conditions existing since its close have been responsible for the material increase in the expenditures for vehicle service. Congress, recognizing that conditions were unusual, passed an act on July 2, 1918, authorizing the Postmaster General to readjust the pay of screen-wagon contractors on account of conditions growing out of the war, and in accordance with this authorization all contracts entered into prior to June 30, 1917, were readjusted, the average increase amounting to approximately 35 per cent. The adjustments made, however, appear not to have been liberal enough to cover the loss sustained, for the reason that many contractors claimed that even with the readjustment their contract was a losing proposition. This is mentioned for the reason that it was at this juncture that the big extension in Government-owned motor-vehicle service began, and the Government was required to pay the same increased cost for labor, materials, and supplies that the contractor would have been required to pay had the service been continued under contract.

The increase in the postal receipts is not a satisfactory criterion of the need for additional vehicular service for the reason that the bulk of the postage is paid on letter mail, which it is believed constitues less than 3 per cent in weight of the volume of the mail handled. Therefore, to gain a fair idea of the additional burden placed on the vehicular service as the result of the growth of the postal business, weight only should be considered.

Even the increase in the volume of mail to be handled fails to show the entire demand on the vehicular service for the reason that practically every change that is made in the method of handling mail in cities imposes an additional burden on the vehicle-service appropriation. For example, when pneumatic-tube service, with an operating expense of $960,000 per year, was discontinued on June 30, 1918, it was necessary to use motor trucks to transport the mail formerly handled by the tubes, the operating expense of which is paid from the vehicle-service appropriation. When Government-owned service was established at Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Omaha, and Kansas City, a very large percentage of the mail was transported by electric cars, the operating expense of which was paid from an appropriation for the specific purpose. The electric-car service, besides being decidedly inferior to the present service, was on the verge of a breakdown, the companies alleging that they were operating at a loss, and when this service was superseded by vehicle service the operating cost was charged against the vehicle-service appropriation. Furthermore, in every city where Government-owned motor-vehicle service has been established the collection and delivery facilities have been improved, affording relief to the appropriation from which letter carriers are paid, motor-vehicle collection and delivery service having been substituted for the collection and delivery service performed by carriers on foot. In three cities the motorization of the collection and delivery service saved approximately $280,000 in carrier service, but imposed a somewhat less burden on the vehicle-service appropriation.

Periodical counts have been made of the parcel post handled at the 50 largest offices, beginning with the count taken during the two weeks from April 1 to April 15, 1913, the result of which is shown in the following table:

	Pounds.
Apr. 1–15, 1913	11,930,469
Oct. 1–15, 1913	18,645,041
Apr. 1–15, 1914	28,558,700
Oct. 1–15, 1914	34,600,370
Apr. 1–15, 1915	36,131,954
Oct. 1–15, 1915	41,826,920
Apr. 1–15, 1916	44,246,180
Oct. 2–16, 1916	48,405,359
Apr. 2–16, 1917	46,582,587
Oct. 1–15, 1919	92,825,935
Oct. 1–15, 1920	105,898,298
Oct. 1–15, 1921	116,321,465

Postmasters report that the increase in the volume of mail during the present year has been greater than during previous years, and this seems to be borne out by the fact that the postal receipts at the 50 largest offices during the first five months of the current fiscal year were 12.57 per cent greater than during the corresponding period of the fiscal year ended June 30, 1922. As a matter of information, it may be stated the increase in the postal receipts during the first five months of the current fiscal year is 1.97 per cent greater than the increase during the two previous fiscal years combined.

With a view to saving carriers' time and relieving them of carrying excessive loads the practice was adopted recently of relaying mail for local delivery to storage boxes placed on the route of the carrier. As an example of this service, reference is made to a letter from the postmaster of Chicago under date of November 27, 1922, stating that 261 deposit boxes are located at convenient points in station districts furnishing depositories for approximately 700 carrier satchels, which, on account of their weight, are transported from stations to these deposit boxes by trucks. This work requires the time of eight trucks, each working eight hours per day. Trucks are further used for the purpose of transporting carriers to routes where routes are some distance from the post office and street-car facilities are not available. This saves carrier time, effecting an economy in the operation of the service as a whole.

Pick-up service (collecting mail from business establishments) has been authorized in a few instances where such service is advantageous to the department. The principal advantage of this service is to provide an even flow of mail into the post office, so that it can be worked with a minimum-size force. There are also instances where the mail is of a very heavy nature, such as films, and where films are collected from the exchanges they are transported directly to the railroad stations and vice versa, thus eliminating a double handling over the loading platforms at post offices. In a limited number of instances door-to-door pick-up service is in operation, but this service is of such "special nature" that it is being discontinued on the ground that all patrons of the Postal Service are entitled to the same character of service, and until the department is able to authorize this special service generally it is believed that all service of this nature should be discontinued.

With respect to the relative cost of Government-owned and contract service attention is invited to the following:

City.	Date Government-owned service established.	Rate per mile with driver.
New York, N. Y.	Jan. 1, 1918	$0.53	$0.45
Baltimore, Md.	Apr. 1, 1919	.4087	.37
Cincinnati, Ohio	Mar. 4, 1919	.53	.40
Boston, Mass.	Oct. 1, 1917	.48	.36
Brooklyn, N. Y.	Jan. 1, 1918	.48	.35
Average		.4857	.386

[1] Contract rate of pay per mile at time department motorized the service with Government-owned trucks.

[2] Cost per mile during fiscal year 1922.

In justice to contract service it should be stated that the mileage paid for covered only the mileage actually performed between transportation points, whereas under Government-owned service it is necessary to pay for all mileage, regardless of whether the truck is transporting mail or is being driven between the garage and the point where mail is to be handled. Adding 10 per cent to the cost per mile of operating Government-owned trucks still leaves a margin in favor of Government-owned service.

The average cost of operating Government-owned trucks per mile with driver during the fiscal year 1921 amounted to 41 cents, while for the fiscal year 1922 the cost decreased to 37 cents.

About a year ago the postmasters of 74 cities operating three-eighths-ton Ford trucks were requested to invite bids for renting equipment, with a view to substituting contract service for Government-owned service. In only four of the 74 cities were the bids received for contract service lower than the cost of operating Government-owned trucks, and in these few instances the difference was very small. The total of the lowest bids received for rented vehicles for the 74 cities amounted to $107,240, whereas the actual cost of operating Government-owned trucks in the cities in mind amounted to $76,860, a difference of $30,380 in favor of Government-owned service.

At the present time the department has contracts for a period of four years or agreements covering a single year for vehicular service amounting to approximately $3,000,000 per year. It has been the practice for some time and will be the practice hereafter to ascertain the cost of securing vehicles under contract before authorizing Government-owned equipment, and Government-owned equipment will not be authorized unless it can be operated more economically than rented equipment. In this connection it should be stated that the trucks that are being placed in the service consist of chassis transferred to the Postal Service by the War Department, under authority of Congress, on which bodies manufactured under contract—a few bodies have been constructed in post-office garages—are mounted, in order that the vehicle may be in a suitable condition for the transportation of mail. It is believed that this method of disposing of surplus motor-truck equipment is to the advantage of the Government, for the reason that while the chassis are serviceable and suitable for use in the Postal Service it would probably be impossible to sell them for more than one-third of their actual present value.

In connection with the extension of vehicular service it should be stated that even the increase in the number of Government-owned trucks in use does not reflect the total growth of the vehicular transportation required in cities, for the reason that large mail-order and publishing houses in many cities are hauling their output between their distribution plants and the depots, which not only saves the Government the expense of haulage but also effects a saving in rent, for the reason that the establishments almost invariably furnish sufficient space in their plants for use in the separation of the mail, the work being performed by post-office employees.

With respect to the cost of supervision in the department and at different post offices it should be stated that when only contract service was in operation all correspondence respecting delays and failures on the part of the contractor in connection with the transportation of mail, including all record work necessarily imposed upon the Postal Service, was performed by employees on the post-office roll whose compensation was not charged against vehicle-service appropriation, whereas at the present time all employees engaged in this class of work, in connection with the operation of Government-owned trucks, are paid from the vehicle-service appropriation.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN H. BARTLETT,
First Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. McKELLAR. In this connection, Mr. President, I wish to state that at a hearing before the committee the other day Mr. Spilman, the chief clerk of the department, produced a statement showing how many of those employed under this appropriation were used. I telephoned him this morning for that statement for use at this time, but he has not yet sent it to me. I ask unanimous consent that when the statement Mr. Spilman used at the hearing comes, it may be incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none, and the order will be made.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to say further in regard to the last item that it has grown in a very remarkable degree. In 1917, I think, about $5,000,000 was appropriated for this item, and in the five or six years which have passed it has grown from $5,000,000 in round numbers to $15,000,000. Fifteen million dollars was appropriated last year and the House appropriated $15,000,000 this year. It is so out of proportion to the general increase in the department that it challenged my attention, and I asked for more specific information from the department, and the letter sent by the First Assistant Postmaster General is in response to the inquiry made by the committee.

I understand also, from a statement made by Mr. Spilman, that this particular branch of the service has been recently turned over to him and that hereafter it will be conducted by him, and he made the statement that he would be very careful to see that the appropriation included in this item would have his careful scrutiny. My own judgment is that there has been considerable waste and extravagance in the use of this item in the last several years. I am not going to discuss it now. I think it was very wise that the committee cut down the appropriation from $15,000,000 to $14,500,000. I hope, and I am sure, when the next appropriation bill comes up we will have a statement of the facts which we can give to the Senate and I hope very largely reduce this item, because I believe there is much extravagance in it.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I desire to return to page 9 of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield to me to submit an amendment to come in near the end of the bill?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I send to the desk an amendment which I offer, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be adopted.

I feel sure there will be no objection to this amendment. I will say to Senators that it is for the purpose of extending the Postal Commission for a period of one year. That commission has done splendid work in the department in my judgment. I think it makes for a saving in the department. I know it has been of very great benefit to the department, and I hope no Senator will object to this amendment being added to this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee will be read.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 20, after line 25, insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the joint commission authorized under section 6 of the act approved April 24, 1920, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes," is hereby continued until June 30, 1924, to complete the investigation and to prepare a detailed report containing a summary of its findings thereof and such recommendations as to legislation as it may deem proper: Provided, That the said commission shall not expend a greater sum than $75,000 during the fiscal year 1924.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In behalf of the committee I desire to offer an amendment on page 9, lines 9 and 10.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 9, lines 9 and 10, strike out "470 inspectors, $1,536,200; in all, $1,599,200," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "520 inspectors, $1,651,200; in all, $1,714,200."

Mr. TOWNSEND. In connection with the amendment I send to the desk a letter from the Acting Director of the Budget Bureau and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be read.

The letter was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF THE BUDGET,
Washington, January 12, 1923.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am informed that your committee is now considering a request made by the Postmaster General that provision be made in the pending appropriation bill for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, for the pay of 50 additional post-office inspectors at the entrance grade of $2,300 each, and for their traveling expenses.

The request of the Postmaster General was made with the prior knowledge of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, and favorable consideration thereof by your committee will not be in conflict with the financial program of the President.

Very truly yours,

R. O. KLOEBER, Acting Director.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, reserving the right to make the point of order on the amendment, may I ask if the Senator has before him the figures, say for the past 20 years, showing the number of post-office inspectors we have had?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator from Michigan will permit me, I will take pleasure in answering the question of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. The number of inspectors provided for the various years since 1904 were as follows:

Nineteen hundred and four, 211 inspectors; 1905, 216; 1906, 226; 1907, 377; 1908, 377; 1909, 355; 1910, 355; 1911, 390; 1912, 390; 1913, 390; 1914, 390; 1915, 420; 1916, 422; 1917, 422; 1918, 422; 1919, 422; 1920, 422; 1921, 435; 1922, 435; for the past year it was increased 50, making 485 for 1923, and now it is proposed to make it 520, as I understand, an increase of 50 more.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think those are the correct figures. It will be seen that just last year we increased the number of inspectors 50, which is a greater increase than ever before occurred in the department in any one year. Always after an increase the number has remained the same for a number of years, and according to the figures the number in two years—1909 and 1910—was actually reduced.

Does that give the Senator from Mississippi the information he desired?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and I thank the Senator. May I now ask the Senator from Michigan, what was the estimate of the Post Office Department to the Bureau of the Budget, taking it as a whole?

Mr. TOWNSEND. This year?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Just what the bill contained as it came from the House.

Mr. HARRISON. Has there been any reduction or increase in the Senate committee?

Mr. TOWNSEND. An increase of 50 inspectors.

Mr. HARRISON. That is the only change in the bill from the House bill?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Oh, the Senator means in the whole bill?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. We have made an increase of about $500,000——

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know whether the Senator understood my question or not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. We are $4,500,000 under the estimates.

Mr. HARRISON. Then the estimate of the Post Office Department to the Bureau of the Budget was no larger than the Bureau of the Budget approved to the Congress for appropriations for the Post Office Department for the coming fiscal year?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am not sure about that. In most of the items the estimate of the department was what the Budget approved, but the Budget did cut down some of the items, quite a number of them.

Mr. HARRISON. Can the Senator give us information as to just how much they did cut from the estimates of the Post Office Department?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The House committee report gives it. The decrease made in the bill in the House compared with the Budget estimate for compensation of postmasters in the First Assistant's department was $500,000.

Mr. HARRISON. They cut it that much?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes. They cut the clerks and employees' item $750,000. They cut the watchmen and messengers' item $135,000; the temporary and auxiliary clerk hire item, $500,000; for unusual conditions, $25,000; for rent, light, and fuel, first, second, and third class post offices, $1,224,000; miscellaneous items, $50,000; letter carriers in cities, $300,000; car fare and bicycle allowance, $150,000. That made a total of $3,634,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Was that cut by the Bureau of the Budget in the estimate presented to it by the Post Office Department?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; that was the cut by the House below the Budget estimate.

Mr. HARRISON. My question was, and I wondered if the Senator had the information, with reference to the cut which the Bureau of the Budget made in the estimates of the Post Office Department.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I know nothing about it. I could not tell what that was because I do not have the estimate of the department to the Budget.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I think it was about 10 per cent of the whole. I have not any information as to each item, but I think the Budget cut the estimates of the Post Office Department nearly 10 per cent.

Mr. HARRISON. The chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads says he knows nothing about it. The Senator from Utah is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and the Senator from Michigan was chairman of the subcommittee which considered the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have not attempted to find out what the estimate of the department was to the Budget. I know nothing about it. We took up the House bill. We called in some of the officials of the department—the Postmaster General, and some of the assistants—as we felt we had a right to do, and put certain questions to them. But we did not ask what their estimates were to the Budget.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator—as I prize very greatly his opinion because of his experience and justice—if he does not think that it would be well, when the Budget presents to the Congress a report for the appropriations for the Post Office Department, that the estimates which have been made to the Bureau of the Budget by the Post Office Department and the reasons assigned by the Budget where cuts were made, should come to Congress? Would it not aid the Congress?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That might be; but I do not see how the Senate is estopped from finding out the facts in reference to the appropriation. The committee feels that it is pretty well qualified to pass upon the bills that come before it and the items in the appropriation bill. We do not hesitate to call in anybody when we want information in reference to any particular item. We have done that from the beginning.

Of course, I realize, if the Senator please, that we have an executive department of the Government. Congress has seen fit to pass what is known as the Budget law. The various heads of the departments are a part of the Executive. The President himself is responsible. Under the law, they make their reports through the Budget to the President as to what they think, in the coordination of the various appropriations that are estimated for in the department, it ought to cost to run the Government. I had supposed that was the one crying need of the Congress—to reduce expenses where it was possible to reduce them.

In the committee over which I have the honor to preside—the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads—when we have presented to us a bill which to us, with our familiarity with the matter, seems to carry a less amount than ought to be carried, we try to post ourselves and do not hesitate to raise the amount; neither do we hesitate to reduce when we believe it is important for the good of the Government, for the financial interests of the Government, that the item should be adjusted. So I can see no injustice that is done Congress through the action of the Budget so far as it affects the Post Office Department appropriation.

Mr. HARRISON. It would affect it to this extent, would it not, may I ask the Senator? Of course his committee may call for the head of the department to get information touching the various items. Some of the heads of the departments, as was shown this morning from the hearings, felt constrained in some instances not to answer questions for fear they might violate the law. But evidently that is not true of the Post Office Department. The Senator as a member of his committee can get the information, but a Senator who is not a member of the committee does not get the information. We can not see the estimates of the department.

The Senator can of course offer his amendment in the committee to increase the amount beyond the Budget figure, and other Members of the Senate who are likewise members of the committee can do the same thing. A Senator, however, who is not so fortunate as to be on the committee, if he thinks differently and believes that the amount should be increased, is precluded on the floor of the Senate from offering an amendment for that purpose. He has no way of ascertaining what the estimate of the department was as to the particular item, because the information is not filed with the committee or with Congress.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads have not seen fit to report in favor of increasing an appropriation that was not approved by the Budget Bureau. As to the amendment which I have offered, the entire committee, with one or two exceptions, was favorable to it; but we felt that it had not been estimated for and had not been approved by the Budget Bureau, and so I was directed to report it as an amendment, provided the Budget Bureau approved it. For that reason, I have presented the letter from the Budget Bureau approving the item, and I should like to speak briefly on the question when the Senator from Mississippi shall have concluded.

Mr. HARRISON. As I understand, then, the Budget Bureau, so far as the Post Office Department is concerned, estimated almost as much as it desired; but the House of Representatives reduced the appropriation for the Post Office Department below the sum allowed by the Budget Bureau by some $5,000,000.

I gather that from the reading of the letter. Therefore the Senate committee found itself in the position that if it desired to increase the amount it could still increase it and yet not go beyond the sum that the Budget Bureau had allowed?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. That is true as to the Post Office Department, but, as was disclosed this morning, in the case of the Agricultural appropriation bill, a different situation was presented.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the Agricultural appropriation bill has been treated quite differently from any other appropriation bill, for there have been very many increases put on that bill by the Senate which I think probably would not have been tolerated on any other except an Agricultural appropriation bill. There would have been objection to them, and a great many of the amendments proposing to increase appropriations would have gone out, as some of them did go out, on points of order. Many amendments proposing such increases, however, were retained.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I merely wish to make a statement with reference to the working of the Budget system. I was not a Member of the Senate when the Budget Bureau was created, but in the last three or four days I have had occasion to find out that its operation should be changed. I am a member of the Post Office Committee of the Senate, but I do not know anything about the pending appropriation bill. It seems to me that matters affecting the Post Office Department should be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I took that view in the case of the Agricultural appropriation bill. In connection with the Agricultural appropriation bill I tried for three days to secure information as to a small item of $10,000, but no Senator could tell me anything about it, and the information at first furnished me by the Department of Agriculture was absolutely erroneous. I think some remedy should be provided whereby the members of a committee may become acquainted with a bill the subject matter of which is under their jurisdiction, so that, in turn, the members of the committee may give information to their colleagues on the floor as to what is contained in the bill or what is not contained in it.

I am not complaining about the committee; I am not complaining about the Budget Bureau; I am not complaining about the President; but I think we ought to change the rule so that the committees to which the various appropriation bills were formerly referred may at least have the benefit of information as to what it is intended to do, so that other Senators who are not on the committee may be able to obtain the information.

I repeat, I am not complaining of the chairman of the committee or of any member of the committee, but I think there is a great need for a change in the rule, and a change in the law, and a change in the administration of the law. I think the suggestion made by the Senator from South Carolina that the Budget should allot to each department a certain amount and that the particular committee having jurisdiction of the subject matter, in connection with the department, should work out and solve the question as to what should be appropriated for the various items is a good one. Then when the question comes on the floor of the Senate it may be intelligently discussed.

I will give an illustration of my position. For instance, in this case I went to the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to ascertain in what bill the appropriation for public roads was carried, for, although I am on the committee, I did not know. I thought the committee might have been consulted. I am not complaining of the particular instance, but I think the operation of the Budget system has proven it to be the most unsatisfactory system that could ever be adopted, more especially in the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I do not desire unduly to take up the time of the Senate, but I wish, in reply to my good friend from Louisiana, to say that, of course, this situation is created by the rules of the Senate.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I understand that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Post Office appropriation bill no longer goes to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, where it has always heretofore been considered. I confess that I was not particularly eager about its transfer to the Committee on Appropriations, but I did not oppose it a year ago, because it seemed to me that at least such a system offered the hope that we might reduce some of the expenditures of the Government, which we were unable to do when various committees of the Senate were subject to all of the appeals and pressure which are brought to bear upon them, and also avoid the duplication of appropriations. So I was willing to try the present system.

The appropriation for roads did not come to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I was interested, however, in the road appropriation, and I followed it and was familiar with the action of the Committee on Appropriations, which had to deal with the subject. I was anxious to know what was going to be appropriated for roads. I ascertained that, and so I was able to answer the question of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. President, I desire to say merely a word in reference to this particular amendment. I repeat that the majority of the Committee on Appropriations, I think with one exception, possibly, though it may be there were others, at the time the appropriation was under consideration, after listening to the testimony of the Postmaster General and Mr. Spilman, were in favor of it. Therefore, I was instructed to offer the amendment on behalf of the committee, providing we obtained the indorsement of the Budget Bureau. Having received what I regard as an indorsement of the amendment on the part of the Budget Bureau I have submitted it to the Senate.

Now, let me say a word or two as to why the amendment should be adopted. As has been stated here, there has been a greater increase in the number of inspectors during the last year than there had been theretofore for many years, and I do not know but for all previous years put together. I do not remember exactly as to that. The fact of the matter, however, is that the necessity for additional inspectors in the Post Office Department is very great. We have just passed through the World War, and the crimes which have been committed against the postal laws are simply appalling. Last year it was shown that there were thousands upon thousands of cases that could not even be investigated because of the lack of sufficient official force to do so.

Last year the Budget recommended an increase of 100 in the number of inspectors, but Congress allowed only 50. There was much said at the time to the effect that we would provide for 50 and then wait a year and ascertain whether it was a good investment on the part of the Government to employ the additional 50 inspectors. A year has now passed, and the fact of the matter is that crime against the postal laws is increasing to such an extent that the department can hardly keep pace with the cases. One of the reasons why they have been unable to check crime against the postal laws is thought by the department—and I concur in their view—to be the delay which is so great that some of the cases become exceedingly stale before they may be even investigated. There are thousands of cases involving offenses against the Government; and yet the legitimate activities of the 50 inspectors for which we provided last year, not all of them as yet experts, because they have to be trained in the business, have resulted, as has been shown, in already saving through the reorganization of a few post offices in the country something in the neighborhood of a million dollars. Practically all of the saving has been brought about through the readjustment of the post offices in New York and in Cleveland by the aid of these inspectors. They are needed, and in my judgment their employment is the best investment the Government can make. It is not a waste of money to employ these men as police officers or law-enforcing officers to prevent crimes against the postal laws, where it is possible to do so, and in other cases to trace out the criminals and apprehend them. That has been done; there is no dispute as to that at all.

Mr. President, I have made inquiry as to a question that was brought up last year when we made the provision for the increased number of inspectors. Several Senators said that the authorization for the additional inspectors would afford an opportunity for the employment of spoilsmen; that the inspectors would be selected from Republicans and would be sent out for the purpose of harassing the Democrats in the various post offices. We provided that they should be selected through the civil service. The rule followed is that no man shall be selected as inspector who has not a passing mark or a rating of at least 94 per cent. That has limited the number very materially. Furthermore, it is a fact that these post-office inspectors are not sent out by the department to investigate the various post offices and postmasters, because that devolves upon the civil service. The civil service sends out one of its representatives and asks to have assigned to it an inspector who is familiar with the class of work that is to be done. In that way these great savings to the Government have been made.

I do not wish to be understood as saying that a saving of a million dollars more or less is all that the inspectors have accomplished. In one case this year, a stale case, where the Government had been defrauded of $2,000,000 by the theft of bonds, they have been recovered and turned back into the Treasury. These inspectors are the police officers of this great department of the Government. I think we would be penny-wise and pound-foolish if we did not grant the additional number of 50 inspectors for the purpose of keeping as clean as possible the administration of the great Post Office Department.

Mr. President, I do not care to discuss the amendment further. It is one for which, as I have said, all of the committee who were present, save one, voted. I should like to have the amendment inserted in the bill. The only way it may go to conference is to have the Senate adopt it, because the House merely provided for the number of inspectors that are already provided for by law.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I make the point of order against the amendment. The Senator, in offering his amendment, produced a letter from the Acting Director of the Budget in which the statement is made:

The request of the Postmaster General was made with the prior knowledge of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget.

Of course that removes the Postmaster General from the penalties imposed for violation of the law, which provides that no request shall be made by the head of a department in excess of the estimate made by the Bureau of the Budget. So it is well and good that that language should be incorporated in the letter by the Acting Director of the Budget. He further says:

And favorable consideration thereof by your committee will not be in conflict with the financial program of the President.

No request is made of Congress to grant the appropriation; no reason is assigned for the appropriation; indeed, no reasons have been given, so far as we know, except those suggested by the Senator from Michigan, which are very good, of course; but there have been no reasons assigned by the Postmaster General or the President. Now, what is the law creating the Budget Bureau and upon which I base the point of order?

The Director of the Bureau of the Budget is the agent of the President. It is the agency that the President can direct to go out and obtain information, coordinate the departments, cut the estimates, and so forth. The Director of the Bureau of the Budget gives it to the President, and the President then approves it and transmits it to Congress. So far as the connection between the Bureau of the Budget and the Congress is concerned, there is no provision of law that constructs any connection. The connecting link between the Bureau of the Budget and the Congress is the President, for the President, and the President only, can transmit it to Congress. The reading of the law will convince any Senator to that effect. It starts out:

TITLE II.—THE BUDGET.

The President shall transmit to Congress on the first day of each regular session the Budget, which shall set forth in summary and in detail—

The law says nothing about the Director of the Budget transmitting to Congress the report of the Postmaster General, but it does say that the President shall transmit to Congress the report, and so forth, under certain conditions. There is nothing here from the President. The only suggestion that we have before us upon which this proposition is based is this letter. Certainly the Senator would not contend for a moment that if it were not for this letter that his proposition would be in order. In other words, it must receive the approval of the Budget Bureau before it is in order; and so the foundation upon which he builds his motion to make it in order is this letter, written to us by the Acting Director of the Bureau of the Budget. So the law says that the report must be transmitted by the President. There is nothing before the Senate from the President.

That is the general report that must be filed by the Bureau of the Budget, upon which the appropriation is to be made. What does the law say with respect to supplemental reports? Let us see:

SEC. 203. The President from time to time may transmit to Congress supplemental or deficiency estimates for such appropriations or expenditures as in his judgment (1) are necessary on account of laws enacted after the transmission of the Budget—or (2) are otherwise in the public interest.

That would not apply—

So the President may transmit to Congress a supplementary or an additional report if the public interest requires it; but the law is as silent as the grave with respect to an Acting Director of the Budget or the Director of the Budget transmitting to the Congress any request. It goes further, indeed.

The whole idea expressed in this bill is that the dealings shall be between the President and the Congress, and that the Budget Bureau is merely the agency or instrumentality of the President to procure information or to cut appropriations if it sees fit.

The same section of the law further says, with respect to the President:

He—

Not the Director of the Budget, not the Acting Director of the Budget, but the President—shall accompany such estimates with a statement of the reasons therefor, including the reasons for their omission from the Budget.

So for three reasons I make the point of order, and for any one of them it should be sustained: First, that the amendment that is offered is not based upon any request of the President; secondly, that even if the President had transmitted the report, it is not accompanied with an estimate and a statement of the reasons therefor; third, that it does not include the reasons of its omission originally from the Budget.

I submit, therefore, that this amendment is not in order under the operation of the Budget system if we are going to comply with the law.

I think it would be useless for me to argue the proposition further.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have just a word to say in reference to the point of order.

I assume, and I think properly, just what the Senator from Mississippi says, that the Budget officer is the agent of the President. The agent of the President speaks for the President to the Senate through that letter. He states that this is in conformity with the President's financial plan. The estimate of the department, and the approval of the Budget a year ago, was for 100 additional inspectors. They assumed that that estimate was sufficient. With the understanding, as was once stated on the floor of the Senate and the House, that we would probably appropriate for 50 more this year, no approval was given by the Budget; but now, when the standing committee of the Senate has passed upon this proposition tentatively, it receives a communication from the Budget officer approving this item, and saying that he speaks for the President, and that it meets with the President's approval.

I had assumed, without going into any technicalities, that that was an approval by the Budget, and, feeling as I did that this was a righteous amendment—and no one familiar with the facts will deny it—I had assumed that no point of order would be made against it; but I am perfectly willing that the Chair shall rule on the point of order and dispose of it. I am advocating it in the interest of the Government. I know that it is the best business proposition we have in this bill. There is not anything that will result in a greater saving to the people than the employment of these 50 additional inspectors. Therefore, as I say, I am perfectly willing to leave the ruling to the Chair and abide the result.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAPPER in the chair). The Chair would like to ask the Senator from Michigan if he understands that the committee has reported this amendment?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The committee directed me to report the amendment to the Senate, providing we got the indorsement or the approval of the Budget officer; and when I received that, which I put in the RECORD, I then offered the amendment for the committee, which passed it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the committee does offer the amendment, and the Chair overrules the point of order made by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I care nothing about the point of order, neither do I desire to be technical; but the decision that the Chair is about to make is very far-reaching. It is a question that will come up in the Senate and in the other House for many years to come, and the ruling the Chair is now about to make will be cited throughout the years in many, many instances. If the Chair rules that the point of order is not well taken——

Mr. STERLING. The Chair has ruled.

Mr. HARRISON. He has only signified his ruling. If the Chair rules—and I should like to have the parliamentary clerk hear me on this proposition, too—that the point of order is not well taken because this is an amendment that is reported by the Senate committee and would be accepted the same as though it had been incorporated in the bill even though it goes above the estimate provided by the Bureau of the Budget, then well and good. That is all right. If, however, the Chair rules that the point of order is not good for the reason that the Acting Director of the Budget or the Director of the Budget could write a letter here, even though the law says the President shall transmit it to Congress, and it will be of the same force as though the President had transmitted it, then that is a question from which I will appeal.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the Senator state that again? I was interrupted, and I did not hear that proposition.

Mr. HARRISON. I say, if the Chair in making this ruling overrules the point of order solely on the theory that this amendment is offered as a committee amendment by the action of the Committee on Appropriations, even though the appropriation is beyond that which was reported in the Budget originally, that is all right; I shall not in that event appeal from the decision of the Chair, because I think the Committee on Appropriations can propose an appropriation in the bill for an amount even greater than that carried in the report of the Bureau of the Budget, although an individual Member on the floor of the Senate under the rules can not do it.

The Senator is offering it as a Senate committee amendment. If, however, the Chair overrules the point of order because, as contended by the Senator, the Acting Director of the Budget has a right to write a letter here, and give no reasons for it, and give no reasons, as the law says he shall do, for the omission, and why it was not included originally, and that he is acting for the President, then I shall appeal from the ruling of the Chair, because we have to follow the Budget law here; and the law is specific that the President can transmit a supplementary or additional report, but that he must give reasons for it, and that he must give a further reason why it was not included originally.

As I say, if the Chair overrules the point of order for the first reason, I shall not appeal; but if the Chair overrules it for the second reason, I shall appeal—not that I care anything about it, but so that we will know where we are and will know what line should be drawn in the future on these matters.

Mr. STERLING. Let me ask the Senator from Mississippi whether I understand him to say that it will be no violation of the Budget law if the chairman of the committee, for the committee, proposes the amendment on the floor of the Senate? That is my understanding of the Senator's position.

Mr. HARRISON. I say this—and it was done in instance after instance in the Agricultural bill; I do not know whether it is done in this Post Office bill or not, because I have not had time to investigate it thoroughly—a committee of the Senate may bring in an amendment carrying an appropriation larger than the Bureau of the Budget estimated for, and that provision is in order under the rules of the Senate; but an individual Senator on the floor of the Senate can not offer an amendment carrying an appropriation greater than the Bureau of the Budget approved, because it would be subject to a point of order. I do not think the Senator and I differ about that.

Mr. STERLING. I understand that the Senator is within his rights and that the proposed amendment is proper under the principle announced by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. I am just saying that if the Senator has offered this proposition as the action of the committee, and they took that action, and it is to be construed as a Senate committee amendment, even though the amount might be greater than the Bureau of the Budget approved, I think it is all right. I shall not appeal from the decision if a point of order is made on that; but the Senator did not rely upon that proposition. He contended in his argument that the Acting Director of the Budget, because he was the agent of the President, could write a letter up here and it would be the same thing as though, under the law, the President transmitted it, when the law specifically says that the President must transmit the supplementary estimate here and must not only give the reasons for the increase but must state why it was omitted in the original estimate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to call the Chair's attention to the fact that this letter does not have the effect that the Senator from Michigan contends that it has. I want to read it, and I hope the Chair will listen. It is addressed to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and is signed by R. O. Kloeber, acting director. It reads as follows:

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am informed that your committee is now considering a request made by the Postmaster General that provision be made in the pending appropriation bill for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, for the pay of 50 additional post-office inspectors at the entrance grade of $2,300 each, and for their traveling expenses.

That is a mere statement of the request of the Postmaster General. Here is what Mr. Kloeber says:

The request of the Postmaster General was made with the prior knowledge of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget—

It does not say it had its approval. It does not say the Budget Bureau approved it; not at all. It merely says, "The request of the Postmaster General was made with the prior knowledge of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, and then he adds this phrase:

And favorable consideration thereof by your committee will not be in conflict with the financial program of the President.

Very truly yours,

R. O. KLOEBER, Acting Director.

If that is an authorization of 50 additional inspectors, then I must admit I am absolutely ignorant of the meaning of language. It does not convey any such notion to my mind. It merely says two things—first, that the request of the Postmaster General was made with the prior knowledge of the director of the bureau; secondly, that favorable consideration by the committee will not be in conflict with the financial program of the President. It does not say the President approves this addition. It does not say that the Bureau of the Budget approves this addition. It is absolutely silent in that regard. Therefore, I say that the Chair can not hinge his ruling upon the approval of the Bureau of the Budget on this item.

While I am on my feet I might say this, that a year ago we increased the number of inspectors by 50, and it seems to me it is an idle thing to increase the number again by the enormous number of 50.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I realize the force of what the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] has said. I want to be absolutely frank with the Senator and with the Senate in saying that my understanding was that I was instructed by the committee to present this amendment providing it was approved by the Budget. So, while I am confident that if the Senate committee were convened it would instruct me to recommend it under the conditions existing now, yet we followed a rule that we would not increase an appropriation over the Budget recommendation. Therefore, to be sure that we were not doing that, they asked me to obtain this information from the department.

The Director of the Budget was out of town and is out of town now. I know that the Budget felt that having authorized an increase of 100 last year and the appropriation to cover it, it would carry until this year. We were satisfied that was not necessarily true. We discussed it in the committee, and, as I said, with one exception the committee was unanimous in favor of this proposition.

I do not like to have the Chair make any ruling which will be embarrassing in the future, and I suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that he ask unanimous consent to withdraw his point of order and let us proceed to vote on the proposition.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have no desire to throw a monkey wrench into the machinery. I want to see the bills expedited as rapidly as possible. I realize that the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, in view of what the Senator has said, without question would put this item in the bill if the matter were before them with this letter.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. HARRISON. If it were in the bill, I am quite sure no point of order could be made against it. But I do not want it to be construed that the Acting Director of the Bureau of the Budget or the Director of the Bureau of the Budget can transmit to Congress or to a committee of Congress a proposition, and that that shall be held to suffice, because the law is specific. But in view of the complications, I am going to withdraw my point of order.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent that an order be entered to that effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi withdraws his point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am opposed to this amendment. Figures have been given showing the large increase in the number of post-office inspectors from 1904 up to the present year. If I caught the figures correctly, they showed that in 1904 there were 211 post-office inspectors in the country, and that now there are 485, and 50 more are sought. This question was fought out in the last Congress. An amendment was offered to increase the number by 100, and finally, over our protest, the number was increased by 50.

Mr. McKELLAR. In that regard I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the number in 1911, 11 years ago, was 390. There was an increase, therefore, of 45 in 11 years. Now, it is proposed to increase the number a hundred in one year.

Mr. HARRISON. A post-office inspector is a peculiar political adjunct to any administration. Not in all instances, but in a great many instances, he is a very good politician. And naturally so. Why? Because when you want to get a fellow of the opposing political party out of a post office the policy that is followed is to make a complaint, and when the complaint comes to the Postmaster General he sends a post-office inspector to make an investigation. Sometimes, of course, if that post-office inspector is not a politician and is free from any political influence, he will look into all the facts fairly and make his report; but if under the present administration he catches the wink of an eye from some high official, suggesting thereby that a particular Democrat should be removed from office, that he has held the postmastership long enough, and that an unfavorable report should come, so that the administration can take care of some of "the faithful and hungry," and thereupon the inspector without investigation makes an unfavorable report against the incumbent, then the office of post-office inspector becomes a political missionary. I presume, though, it was done under the Democratic administrations to some extent, and if it were not done under this Republican administration you have lost a good bet. All of you know it has been done and that it will continue to be done, and I presume they do need more inspectors in order to force the few remaining Democrats out of office. I suppose you are becoming fretful over the number of Democrats who are getting in office. The number naturally is increasing daily. "Every day, in a legitimate way," as Dr. Coué would say, the number is getting greater and greater.

That will continue, Mr. President. But I do not care how many post-office inspectors you name, you can not keep Democrats out of office, because somehow or other the people just naturally want Democrats in office. That is shown in various States. It was shown in Michigan, it was shown in Colorado, in New Hampshire; ah, well, it is shown all over the country. They want Democrats in the municipal offices; they want them in the State offices; they want them in the Federal offices. And why not? They have confidence in the Democrats. They have none in you.

I must say, though, that I do not blame you for wanting to put Republicans in these offices. I wanted the offices given to Democrats when we were in power. You naturally want these additional post-office inspectors in order that Republicans may be put in during the brief span you are in power. That is all right, and I say that the hungry crowd should be taken care of as well as possible. I have said that, so far as my friends in Mississippi are concerned, nobody need appeal to me to hold them in any of these political jobs or to ask me to write a letter in behalf of any person for one of these offices while you are in power. You as Republicans have the responsibility. If you fill the offices with Republicans, then that is your matter, because I realize the more Republicans you appoint the greater the criticism there will be of them in the discharge of their duties and the quicker will the people become disgusted and disgruntled. So while I am opposed to this large increase of 50 post-office inspectors, because it is an additional expense and it will add greater burdens to the already overpressed taxpayers of the country, if the Republican Party, which has the majority here and has the responsibility, want to add to the burdens of the people by creating more offices and political jobs, then well and good. I shall vote against the increase.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have but a few words to say in reference to this item. I am happy to say that this bill has been very carefully prepared, and I think the committee is to be congratulated on the very great care which they exercised with reference to all the items, with the possible exception of two. One of them is the item we are now discussing—adding 50 inspectors. We added 50 inspectors last year, and the figures have just been read showing that this was a tremendous increase over the number added from time to time during the history of the Post Office Department. I object to it because, so far as my knowledge of what these inspectors do goes, their activities are largely political, and have been for some time. I want to give an illustration of it.

Just a few days ago I received a copy of charges filed against a fourth-class postmaster at the little town of Spencer, in Tennessee. Of course, fourth-class postmasters are subject to civil service. The charge made against this gentleman, Mr. Northcutt, was that he had failed to deliver three packages of mail, and that there was some dust found on his counter. The inspector making those charges, Mr. Naylor, gave Mr. Northcutt three days to answer them. He dated his letter November 1, and Mr. Northcutt got it on November 3. He had less than three hours in which to get his answer in the mail before the time limit set, but he did answer, and his answer was that, so far as his not delivering the three packages was concerned, they were three packages of seed mailed to him, or to members of his family, and he had laid them to one side; that they had not been delivered to the postmaster himself and the postmaster's wife, I believe.

That sort of frivolous charges are being investigated by these inspectors, and I know that the inspectors in my State are principally devoting their time and attention to making frivolous examinations of that kind. I do not think we ought to add to the number.

I agree that the Republicans are entitled to the offices. Let them go on and take them, but not spend the people's money making fake investigations. There is no use in it. Let them say like men, "We are in power, the offices are ours, and we want to take them." If they do that, there will be no complaint on this side. But they pretend to be for civil service and to believe in it, yet they send their inspectors to make frivolous examinations of the kind I have just cited. In the case I have just mentioned the postmaster was immediately notified that if his resignation were received within 30 days he would not be removed from office because of the nondelivery of three packages of seed addressed to himself and wife and to his daughter, and because there was some dust on one of the desks in the post office. Those were the charges.

I say that we are piling up taxes against the people for a very improper purpose when we add to this list of inspectors. In 1911 we had 390 inspectors, and during the 10 years that followed there was an increase of only 45. In the past year there has been already an increase of 50, and now it is proposed to increase them by 50 more. Therefore I am opposed to this and shall vote against the increase of these inspectors.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course.

Mr. STERLING. Is not the condition described by Mr. Simmons, chief of the inspection service, in his testimony before the Appropriations Committee last year, when we were considering the Post Office appropriation bill, proof that we did not have enough inspectors at that time?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if they would just put the inspectors' work on the legitimate work of the department, and let the fourth-class postmasters and rural-route carriers in the various districts alone, they would have a sufficient number to do all the work. If they want to turn them out for political reasons, let them turn them out without making any investigation.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I quite agree with the chairman of the committee having in charge the bill that this is the best business proposition contained in the bill, to increase the number of post-office inspectors. I want to call attention to a statement or two made by Mr. Rush D. Simmons, chief inspector, in his testimony before the committee last year. He said:

> Mr. SIMMONS. We have been getting behind for a number of years. That is, a great many cases have been allowed to die of age and be closed. The records would show "closed," but the complaints and investigations called for—we were unable to give attention at the time when it would have been of any value, and then the increasing service—that is, the change in the character of the service, the parcels post, and the depredations that came along with it, the opportunities for depredations, brought a very large addition to take care of. We did not formerly have that condition to cope with.

Further on he said, in answer to a question:

> Senator STERLING. Your inspections involve the furnishing of evidence, do they not, to the Government in case of prosecution?
> Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.
> Senator STERLING. Take the fraudulent use of the mails, or sending prohibited matter through the mails.
> Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.
> Senator STERLING. You have to investigate and furnish the testimony?
> Mr. SIMMONS. Inspectors furnish the testimony (the evidence) to the United States attorney.
> Senator STERLING. Are there some cases of that kind pending for a long time, where you have not been able to inspect, or get together the evidence for the trial of the case?
> Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; there are a great many of those. Some of them are two years old or more.

Thus, Mr. President, it appeared from the testimony that from lack of a sufficient number of inspectors these cases were allowed to become old. The result is, as in any suit at law, that witnesses remove or die, and the Government, because it can not promptly prosecute the cases, is without the evidence to go on with them, and from lack of sufficient inspectors in the service.

I think, just as the chairman of the committee has said, that it is a business proposition pure and simple, and that Congress surely ought to provide an additional number of inspectors. As has been stated, 100 were asked for last year, 50 were given, and we are asking now for the 50 more that should have been allowed last year. A part of the condition described by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] is due to the fact that we had not theretofore provided from time to time the number of inspectors we should have had.

As to anything political in regard to the provision, it is absolutely free from politics. The inspectors are under the civil service law and civil service rules, and "deserving Democrats" have as good a chance as anybody else to be appointed to the inspection service.

So, Mr. President, I trust the amendment will prevail for the sake of the service and from the standpoint of good business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered in behalf of the committee by the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There is another part of the amendment. Having adopted the amendment just referred to, it is necessary that the total should be changed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 9, line 19, strike out "$424,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$468,300."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report the following amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], and ask unanimous consent that it may be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 15, after line 9, insert the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That no contract or contracts for carrying mails on foreign steamships shall be made when such mail can be carried on American steamships at a reasonable price.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That completes the committee amendments.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I am going to detain the Senate just a moment. The Assistant Postmaster General has sent me the statement that was made by Mr. Spilman before the committee a day or two ago, and which I have asked and received unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD. But there are two or three matters concerning it that I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate very briefly.

I find that under the item of $15,000,000 the personal service of employees amounts to $6,730,000. The items are divided as follows: Eight representatives, $24,400; 56 superintendents, $141,000; 6 assistant superintendents, $12,800; 41 chief mechanics, $95,200; 49 record clerks, $102,900; 34 supply clerks, $62,600; 2 personnel clerks, $4,600; 3 foremen, $6,200; 3 paymasters, $6,700; 9 chief chauffeurs in charge, $17,500; 77 chauffeurs in charge, $143,700; 9 chauffeur supervisors, $19,000.

Under the head of employees are 151 office employees, $245,207; 872 mechanics, $1,738,015; 2,082 chauffeurs, $3,264,990; 600 garage men, $844,988.

Mr. President, it will be seen that for every two and one-half chauffeurs we have a mechanic, and that for every three and a fraction chauffeurs we have a garage man. As I said before, these items indicate wasteful extravagance. It is not necessary to have all of these superintendents and mechanics and garage men. There are almost as many mechanics and garage men as there are chauffeurs running the trucks. It is a willful and woeful waste of money, in my judgment. Of the total appropriation $6,730,000 is appropriated for the payment of salaries.

I call attention to another remarkable item in the list:

Transportation of things (service).

That means nothing to anybody, nobody explains it, and yet it carries an appropriation of $3,350,000.

I am calling public attention to it in this way for the purpose of expressing the hope that the new man who will have charge, Mr. Spilman, will go to the bottom of it and create a very considerable saving during the present year. I want to say publicly that I am going to the bottom of it, and the next time that item comes before the committee it is going to be thoroughly examined and most carefully scrutinized.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the committee listened to the testimony of Mr. Spilman and it has now before it the letter of the First Assistant Postmaster General in reference to the matter. As I said, the committee did not feel like granting the whole $15,000,000 upon the showing that was made by Mr. Spilman. It should be stated, however, that Mr. Spilman did not profess to know much about the matter, as it had just been placed in his hands and he had had no time to go over it. He did suggest two or three items that in his judgment ought to be changed, which he thought too extravagant. He insisted upon the full $15,000,000 because there is a deficiency appropriation for that purpose. We are going into the matter, as the Senator from Tennessee has stated, but it ought to be understood just exactly what the situation is.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to be inserted at the end of the bill and ask unanimous consent for its consideration. It relates to a matter which has been considered heretofore by the Senate. It does not increase any appropriation, but authorizes a change in the plans for the construction of a post office at Las Vegas, N. Mex. Senators present are quite familiar with it and I ask that it may be added as an amendment at the end of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The READING CLERK. Add at the end of the bill the following additional section:

SEC. —. That so much of section 16 of the act of Congress approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stat. p. 883), which directed the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase a site, or acquire it by condemnation or otherwise, on land at a convenient point between the incorporated city of East Las Vegas, N. Mex., and the incorporated town of Las Vegas, N. Mex., and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the post office, courthouse, and other governmental offices, etc., be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be erected, on the site heretofore acquired by the United States for the purpose, a suitable and commodious building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, approaches, etc., complete, for the use and accommodation of the post office, at a limit of cost not to exceed $115,930.40.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I propose an amendment which I know is subject to a point of order, because it provides for an increase of an appropriation. Therefore I am afraid the chairman will raise the point of order; and if he does, of course it goes out. The amendment is to increase an appropriation from $1,500,000 to $1,700,000. The purpose of the amendment is to increase village delivery throughout the country. I understand the Postmaster General asked for the amount for which I am asking, that it was estimated for, and that the Budget cut it to $1,500,000.

There was a time, as I understand from the chairman of the committee himself, when the Postmaster General wanted to wipe out all village delivery and save to the country $1,500,000 or more; but the Congress has not seen fit to do so. We find the state of affairs to be that some villages have the free delivery and other villages, which have outgrown those that have it, can not understand why they can not get it.

If we are going to have this service at all, we ought to extend it so that the villages which have grown larger than those where free delivery is now established should have it. I appeal to the Senator, let there not be this discrimination. If we are going to have the service, let all the villages have it which are entitled to it. I can call the Senator's attention to towns in my own State in which this service is not provided that have outgrown other towns which have free delivery; they are entitled to it; but the Postmaster General states that they can not get it. Senators will realize what a discrimination that is. I desire that we shall stop such discrimination. If it be desired to abolish this service, that is all right; then there will be no discrimination; but to let some towns have it and others which are entitled to it not to have it is all wrong, in my judgment. Therefore I offer the amendment, trusting that the Senator from Michigan will not raise the point of order against it. As I understand, the Postmaster General has estimated for it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator from North Carolina is absolutely wrong about that.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was so informed; but one can not always get the truth about these matters.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 12, line 12, it is proposed to strike out "$1,500,000" and to insert "$1,700,000."

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am obliged to make the point of order against the amendment that it has not been estimated for or approved by the Budget or by the committee. In making the point of order, however, I merely wish to say, in answer to the statement of the Senator from North Carolina, that for a number of years the Post Office Department has asked that this service be abolished, stating that it was an expensive service, without any adequate return in benefits; also that it is going to cost a great deal of money to carry it on. Last year, however, instead of abolishing the service, we concluded to continue it by an appropriation for the offices where it was already in existence, feeling that it was a very difficult matter to take away from the people of a community a privilege which they already enjoyed, but we were very much opposed to extending the service. Therefore I am obliged to make the point of order against the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question in reference to the appropriation carried in the following proviso in the bill, which is found on page 20, line 4:

For pay of rural carriers, substitutes for rural carriers on annual and sick leave, clerks in charge of rural stations, and tolls and ferriage, Rural Delivery Service, and for the incidental expenses thereof, $86,900,000.

I am wondering if the amount here provided is sufficient to meet the requirements of the service and fairly cover the needs of the rural carriers.

I have had some correspondence with some of the rural carriers of my State with reference to aid needed for sick leave and for expenses incurred in the wear and tear of vehicles used in the service. My friend from Tennessee was a member of the subcommittee which considered this matter, and I wish to ask him if the amount here proposed to be appropriated covers what the rural carriers have shown was necessary for properly carrying on their part of the work in the Postal Service?

Mr. McKELLAR. It covers what the Post Office Department estimated as being the amount necessary to carry on the Rural Delivery Service. I think the House of Representatives allowed exactly what was asked for.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The House increased it, and it is the only item which the House did increase.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true. The House increased it; and there is no trouble in the world now about the matter, I desire to say to the Senator from Alabama. The entire committee was favorable to liberal treatment for the rural carrier service.

Mr. TOWNSEND. As I have stated, this is the only item in the bill which the House of Representatives increased over the estimate, and the Senate committee agreed with them.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; I knew that it had been increased. I was convinced that there ought to be an increase in the appropriation for this service, and I have advocated such an increase. I am glad to know that the amount as increased is adequate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If it be necessary, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary be authorized to make such correction of the totals in the bill as may be necessary by reason of amendments which have been agreed to by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

ORDER FOR RECESS TO MONDAY.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate closes its business to-day it take a recess until 12 o'clock on Monday next.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

NITRATE OF SODA.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, in accordance with the understanding which we previously had, I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 265) to stimulate crop production in the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution; which was read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President is authorized and directed to procure, or aid in procuring, such stocks of nitrate of soda as he may determine to be necessary and find available for increasing agricultural production during the calendar year 1923, and to dispose of the same at cost, payable in advance. For carrying out the purposes of this joint resolution there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, available immediately and until expended, the sum of $10,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and the President is authorized to make such regulations and to use such means and agencies of the Government as in his discretion he may deem best. The proceeds arising from the disposition of the nitrate of soda may go into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts: Provided, That the sum herein appropriated and the proceeds arising from the disposition of the nitrate of soda may be used, at the discretion of the President, during the calendar year 1923 as a revolving fund for the purposes herein named.

Mr. SMITH. There is an amendment which I desire to be made, which has been prepared in proper form by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. SMOOT. On page 1, line 7, after the word "at," I move to strike out the word "cost" and to insert "the total cost to the Government"; so that it will read:

And to dispose of the same at the total cost to the Government, payable in advance.

Mr. SMITH. That amendment should be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH. There is a typographical error on page 2, line 1, of the joint resolution. The word "shall" should be substituted for the word "may" at the beginning of line 2, and I move that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator if it is really necessary that the revolving fund provided for in the joint resolution shall be $10,000,000?

Mr. SMITH. The transaction involved will be of such a character that that amount will be essential. When it shall become necessary to make the purchases, the President will notify the agents, and so much as may be necessary will be expended. Nitrate of soda costs about $40 a ton, and in order to contract for two or three hundred thousand tons it is necessary that the money shall be available.

Mr. SMOOT. Is the Government to be required to pay for the nitrate of soda before delivery?

Mr. SMITH. The Government will have to pay for it, and I presume certified checks will be deposited to cover the cost.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, before the shipment of the nitrate of soda?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. In that case this amount may be required. I simply had in mind that if the Government did not have to pay for the nitrate before delivery a much less sum than $10,000,000 would be necessary.

Mr. SMITH. That is true.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I move to amend the joint resolution of the Senator from South Carolina by adding the words "and calcium arsenate" after the words "nitrate of soda" wherever they appear.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that practically every Senator on this side of the Chamber from the agricultural section of the South agrees with me that calcium arsenate is needed far more than is nitrate of soda in the production of cotton. At this time the Government owns and has already advertised for sale 28,000 tons of nitrate of soda which can be used, but there is greater necessity in the South for calcium arsenate than there is for anything else. No matter how much fertilizers the farmer uses, the boll weevil will destroy most of the cotton unless calcium arsenate is used.

The New England manufacturers can not secure cotton unless the farmers of the South are able to obtain calcium arsenate. The rights of the Government will be safeguarded in every way if my amendment shall be adopted. So I hope that the Senator from South Carolina will accept the amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator, I understand that calcium arsenate is the latest development in the way of controlling the boll weevil. The trouble is that there is not a sufficient supply of it, and it is very expensive and costly as it is now being handled. The use of calcium arsenate will accomplish the control of that pest so that the farmers may go on with production. It is useless to fertilize cotton unless something may be produced, and if the insect is allowed to eat up the bolls, of course there can be but little cotton. The use of calcium arsenate will help to a great degree in controlling that situation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I know the importance of calcium arsenate. When the tariff bill was under consideration here I tried to secure sufficient protection for it to enable it to be produced in this country and thereby render it possible for the consumers in this country to get from under the one concern, located in London, that is controlling it in the world. I am as positive as that I live that if the proposal to impose an adequate tariff duty on calcium arsenate had been agreed to we would be making it in this country before now.

The price of calcium arsenate has nearly doubled since that time, and it is necessary for the consumers in this country to buy it from one concern located in England which controls practically the whole output outside of what little is produced in the United States.

Mr. HARRIS. There is some produced in Germany.

Mr. SMOOT. But the one trust in England controls all of the commodity outside of that which is made in the United States. The only way we will ever get cheap white arsenic—for that is what calcium arsenate is—is to make it in this country; but that can not be done so long as there is a trust controlling the whole product of the world which may destroy any industry which may be established in the United States and then put the price to whatever point it may desire.

I know that the Senator from Georgia does not believe nor does the Senator from South Carolina believe in what I am saying, but I believe we will never have cheap white arsenic until we have a protective tariff in order that we may establish the industry in the United States.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, we may differ about what the Senator says, but everyone in the South knows that unless calcium arsenate is available there will not be produced any cotton in certain sections of the South, no matter how much sodium nitrate may be obtainable.

Mr. SMOOT. The South is going to grow some cotton whether there is any calcium arsenate or not, because all that we have ever had in this country does not exceed in value more than a few million dollars. I will admit, however, that white arsenic is a proper substance to be used to destroy the boll weevil, and I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. I am glad to hear the Senator say that.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not making my statement by way of criticism of the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia, but I am calling attention to the fact that conditions exist now which I knew would exist unless the action to which I have referred was taken in connection with the tariff bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from South Carolina will accept my amendment to the joint resolution. I have talked to all the Senators on this side who are present, with one exception, and everyone agrees with me that calcium arsenate is more important to the farmers of the South than is sodium nitrate, but they are both necessary to the farmers. I hope the Senator from South Carolina will accept my amendment.

Mr. SMITH. I am perfectly willing to have the question put to a vote.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator indicate whether he wants to accept the amendment of the Senator from Georgia. If he has no objection, let the joint resolution be modified accordingly. I have not any objection to offer. The principle is the same in one case as in the other.

Mr. HARRIS. Exactly the same.

Mr. SMITH. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. The only difference is that calcium arsenate is used in the West to some extent; and I hope that the mere fact that it is used outside of the South is not going to prejudice the matter at all.

Mr. HEFLIN. One is used to help produce cotton, and the other is used to fight the boll weevil while it is being produced.

Mr. SMOOT. White arsenic has been used more for the destruction of flies upon orchard trees than for any other purpose in the past. If it is going to be used for the destruction of the boll weevil, then, of course, I am quite sure that we in the West may secure advantages that we would not get in any other way.

Mr. HARRIS. The Secretary of Agriculture recommends the use of calcium arsenate and states that it is the one thing that will help us destroy the boll weevil, which is absolutely necessary in the South in the production of cotton this year.

Mr. SMOOT. I repeat, I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, in that case does not the Senator think that the revolving fund should be increased?

Mr. SMITH. No.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that will not be necessary, because all that we have ever bought in the past does not exceed in value but a little over $1,000,000. So it is not necessary to increase the fund.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, there is not any doubt about the importance to the farmers, not only of the South but of the whole country, of procuring white arsenic at a reasonable price. It is as important as is the nitrate of soda. As the Senator from Utah says, it is not only used in fighting the boll weevil, but it is used in fighting all the pests that attack vegetable plants. I think the amendment of the Senator from Georgia should be attached to the joint resolution.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I shall not interpose any objection to the joint resolution offered by the Senator from South Carolina, nor to the amendment that is proposed by the Senator from Georgia; but I want to take this opportunity to say that legislation of this character, to my mind, is of very, very doubtful wisdom.

I hear much said on the floor of the Senate by way of criticism about the gradual extension of the functions of the Government. I think the criticism is a just one, and I doubt very much whether it is a wise exercise of the functions of government to have the Government of the United States go into the business of buying commodities.

Mr. SMITH. Except in an emergency of this kind.

Mr. WILLIS. As I say, I am not going to object to this proposition, but I do not believe in the principle. I do desire, however, to ask a question of the Senator from South Carolina. I shall not oppose his joint resolution, but I am wondering about the practical working of the matter.

In line 7 the joint resolution says that the President shall "dispose of the same at cost."

Mr. SMOOT. I have had that amended.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator has had it amended, has he?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. How is it amended?

Mr. SMOOT. It is amended so as to read "and dispose of the same at the total cost to the Government."

Mr. WILLIS. Then I want to ask a question of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will say to the Senator that that was done before, in the case of the other joint resolution.

Mr. SMITH. This same law was in operation in 1917 and 1918.

Mr. WILLIS. I understand about that, but this is another matter. I am wondering how this will work out in practice. Here comes A and offers to take the whole quantity at cost. Is he entitled to it then? How is it going to work practically?

Mr. SMOOT. That is in the discretion of the President.

Mr. WILLIS. That is made discretionary?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes; discretion is given to him.

Mr. WILLIS. Of course, I understand that the purpose is to have it sold out in small quantities.

Mr. HARRIS. Through the commissioners of agriculture and other farm officers. The Government did not lose a cent before.

Mr. WILLIS. I shall not object to it.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from Georgia that there will have to be three amendments to the joint resolution to make it perfect. The first one will have to be on line 4, page 1; the second on line 1, page 2; and the third on line 4, page 2.

Mr. SMITH. I suggest, then, that wherever the words "nitrate of soda" occur the words "and calcium arsenate" be added.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE SENATE MANUAL.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, from the Committee on Rules I report a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. I will state that it is the usual resolution passed at this stage of the session in order to prepare the Manuals for the incoming Senators and the sitting Senators for the new Congress.

The resolution (S. Res. 404) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be instructed to prepare a new edition of the Senate Manual, and that there be printed 3,500 copies of the same for the use of the committee, of which 300 copies shall be bound in full morocco and tagged as to contents.

TRANSPORTATION OF SILVER DOLLARS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I introduce a bill and ask to have it read at length.

The bill (S. 4337) to provide for the payment of charges incurred in transportation of standard silver dollars was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to provide, upon application, for the transportation, including insurance charges, of standard silver dollars from the Treasury and the United States mints to the Federal reserve banks and from such banks to the applicant. Such transportation shall be by such means as the Secretary deems advisable and shall be free of any charge to the applicant.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury and to be available until July 1, 1924.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to make just a short statement.

Two objects are sought to be attained by the passage of such legislation as this. The first is economy; and a statement as to how it will economize and lower the expense of our Government is as follows:

To-day paper currency is being used instead of silver all over the United States. Banks can not afford to pay the express charges upon silver. They are compelled to pay the charges upon paper, but they amount to very little, indeed. The economy in the matter would arise from this fact: Every piece of paper money, whether it is the dollar bill or any other kind of a bill, costs the Government 2 cents; and that is repeated every time the bill is destroyed because of its being worn out and dirty and a new one is printed. The western banks can not very well afford to pay the express charges upon money. They amount to a great deal; and that is the reason why, when you go into the West, if you do find any paper money it is so dirty and so ragged that it is a shame that the Government of the United States should allow it to circulate among the people. I think it carries diseases.

This bill simply authorizes the Government of the United States to pay the express charges on silver dollars; not on the subsidiary coins; not to pay the express charges from the banks back to Washington, because there will be no change in the silver dollar. It is not like the paper dollar. The paper dollar wears out in the East. We hardly have it in circulation more than an average of about two years. Some of it does not last over a year; and the eastern people would not allow our Government to have in circulation among the people paper money the same as that used in the West. The only expense attached to this on the part of the Government would be the express charges on the silver dollars from any mint that may be operating to the bank asking for those silver dollars. After that expense is paid there is no other. They will be there for 50 years, and the same silver dollars can be in circulation right along.

Mr. HEFLIN. What is the total amount?

Mr. SMOOT. I hope that if this bill is passed at least 40,000,000 silver dollars will be put into circulation throughout the West. That will relieve our Treasury here of that amount of silver and it will give the western people silver dollars that they can carry without being compelled to carry this dirty, worn-out paper money.

Mr. HEFLIN. This will increase the per capita sum in circulation, then?

Mr. SMOOT. No. The banks have the ordering of it. The Government does not spend a single dollar of it unless the banks order it. Instead of the banks being compelled to pay the expressage on paper money, they will have the privilege of having silver dollars sent out there; and then, when they have gotten them, they will not have to have them renewed, and they will not have to send them in.

Mr. HEFLIN. Putting this money into circulation does increase the volume; does it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no. The banks would not have any more money on hand, but it would take the place of paper money, such as they have now.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am in favor of increasing the circulation myself.

Mr. SMOOT. This bill will not increase the circulation at all.

Mr. HEFLIN. What will be the cost to the Government of transporting this silver?

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for about $25,000; but when it is once transported, that ends it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senator's idea is that when a bank out West wants money, inasmuch as the bank will be relieved of the express charges on the money if silver is sent, the Government will pay the cost of transporting the silver?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and make up more than that expense in not sending out West the paper money upon which they will have to pay the express charges; but with the silver it will be only once.

Mr. FLETCHER. I see; and save the expense of renewing the paper money which is worn out?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. We renew it, and every new bill costs the Government of the United States 2 cents, and that $25,000 would be made up many, many times over. That is why I say it is economy to do it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the Senator think that would be satisfactory to the banks and the people? Would they just as soon have the silver?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, they are asking me now to introduce this bill and secure its passage. There is no doubt about that. Of course there are certain people in the West who would prefer to have bright, new paper money, the same as there are in the East; but I will state to the Senator that if he has ever traveled out in the West he knows what kind of paper money he gets. It is very seldom that we ever see a bright, new paper dollar. The expressage on the money is too high, in the first place, and they simply use it and use it until it is almost rotten. That is as far as economy is concerned. Then again, Mr. President, I hope that the result of the passage of this legislation will be to encourage the use of silver throughout all the United States, and that will help. If that much more money is thrown into circulation, then of course the banks will have more deposits. It will not make any difference at all to the Government, however.

I simply wanted to make that statement at this time.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have no desire to interfere with the passage of the resolution of the Senator from Utah. If these people in the West want this silver money, I want them to have it.

Mr. SMOOT. It has to go to the committee first. It is a bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. It has been referred to the committee, has it?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. I was just going to say that the Senator said that they want silver money out there. I have no objection to their having it. I should like to see more silver money and more of every kind of good money in circulation, but the Senator said something about paper money spreading disease. He said dirty money spreads disease. Well, there is nothing that would give the masses of the American people so much pleasure at this time as to bring them in close contact with any kind of money. They would even be glad to subject themselves to the danger that might threaten in dirty paper money.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not mean to say that I said all paper money.

Mr. HEFLIN. No.

Mr. SMOOT. I said after it is used until you can hardly tell whether it is a dollar bill or what it is, and is dirty and almost rotten. That is the only time that it carries disease.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am speaking of how novel a thing any sort of money is under a Republican administration.

Mr. SMOOT. And it is very much improved since the last administration.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I want to say a few words in regard to the bill the Senator from Utah has just introduced. I am very heartily in favor of it. A large portion of the people in our western country are heartily in favor of it, as they have been accustomed to using silver coin for many years. For a number of years economic conditions have taken silver dollars off the market, and the people of the West have been compelled to use paper money. They want this bill to be passed, and I hope it will be passed.

HAWAIIAN HOMES COMMISSION.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate bill 4309, a bill to which I think there can be no objection.

Mr. CURTIS. Let it be read, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The reading clerk read the bill.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I desire especially to call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the very brief statement I shall make with reference to this bill.

At the last regular session we passed a bill amending the organic act of the Territory of Hawaii, what was known as the Hawaiian rehabilitation bill. In the passage of that act an error was made, through inadvertence or a typographical error, I do not know which. The mistake was in the section of the law cited in the bill. It should have referred to section 213, when in fact it refers, as printed, to section 212. This bill corrects that typographical error. That is the extent of that part of it, to carry out the purpose we had in mind in passing the act originally.

Another point is that it has been found, under the operation of the act, that it can very well be extended a little by permitting natives to take up small tracts of a half acre or less, upon which to build houses. They do not want to take 20-acre tracts for homestead purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. They want their little colianes.

Mr. NEW. Exactly; they want a little site on which they can get the practical benefit of the homestead law, and on which they can build their little shacks and establish their own homes so as to get them out of the tenement district.

I can not see any possible objection to the bill, and probably great benefit would be derived from it. The governor, the former governor, and all the usual sources of information and advice concerning affairs in the Hawaiian Islands are for it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no change in the revolving fund known as the Hawaiian home loan fund?

Mr. NEW. No; except that under the old law they could loan $3,000 to the homesteader. This permits them to loan up to a limit of $1,000 to the little fellow who wants to build on a half-acre site.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, it gives authority to lend $1,000 to buy his coliane?

Mr. NEW. That is all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4309) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii,' approved April 30, 1900, as amended, to establish an Hawaiian homes commission, granting certain powers to the board of harbor commissioners of the Territory of Hawaii, and for other purposes," approved July 9, 1921, which had been reported from the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions with amendments, on page 2, line 3, to strike out "leave" and to insert in lieu thereof "lease"; and on page 2, after the word "limits," on line 5, to insert the words "per each lessee," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph (a) of section 207 of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii,' approved April 30, 1900, as amended, to establish an Hawaiian homes commission, granting certain powers to the board of harbor commissioners of the Territory of Hawaii, and for other purposes," approved July 9, 1921, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(a) The commission is authorized to lease to native Hawaiians the right to the use and occupancy of a tract of Hawaiian home lands within the following acreage limits per each lessee:

"(1) Not less than 20 nor more than 80 acres of agricultural lands; or

"(2) Not less than 100 nor more than 500 acres of first-class pastoral lands; or

"(3) Not less than 250 nor more than 1,000 acres of second-class pastoral lands: Provided, however, That lots, each of one-half of an acre or more, of any class of land may be leased as residence lots."

SEC. 2. That section 213 of the said act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 213. There is hereby established in the treasury of the Territory a revolving fund to be known as the 'Hawaiian home loan fund.' The entire receipts derived from any leasing of the 'available lands' defined in section 203, these receipts including proportionate shares of the receipts from the lands of Huumula Mauka, Piihonua, and Kaohe Makuu, of which lands portions are yet to be selected, and 30 per cent of the Territorial receipts derived from the leasing of cultivated sugar-cane lands under any other provision of law, or from water licenses, shall be covered into the fund until the amount of moneys paid therein from those three sources alone shall equal $1,000,000. In addition to these moneys and the moneys covered into the revolving fund as installments paid by lessees upon loans made to them as provided in paragraph 2 of section 215, there shall be covered into the revolving fund all other moneys received by the commission from any source whatsoever."

SEC. 3. That paragraph (1) of section 215 of the said act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(1) The amount of loans to any one borrower outstanding at any one time shall not exceed $3,000: Provided, however, That the amount of loans outstanding at any one time to the holder of a residence lot shall not exceed $1,000."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, January 14, 1923.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Page Milburn, of Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, the high and lofty One that inhabitest eternity, whose name is Holy. Thou dwellest in the high and holy place, and through thy loving condescension thou dwellest with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit.

We come to Thee this day for the bestowal of those things which man can not provide. In the time of sorrow human sympathy is sweet, and human words are helpful, but there are depths which human reason can not fathom, storms which human sympathy can not quiet. But we are thankful to-day that the Lord's hand is not shortened that it can not save, neither His ear heavy that it can not hear. May the Divine Comforter abide with us forever.

Sing, O heavens; and be joyful, O earth; and break forth into singing, O mountains; for the Lord hath comforted His people, and will have mercy upon His afflicted.

Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost. As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be; world without end. Amen.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the reading of the Journal will be deferred until to-morrow.

There was no objection.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE MANN.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the special order for to-day.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. MADDEN, by unanimous consent—

Ordered, That Sunday, January 14, 1923, at 12 o'clock noon, be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. JAMES R. MANN, late a Representative from the State of Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 481.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. JAMES R. MANN, late a Member of this House from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House at the conclusion of the exercises of the day shall adjourn.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to preside.

Mr. CANNON took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG].

Mr. RODENBERG. Mr. Speaker, we have met to pay tribute to the memory of a great American. JAMES R. MANN was a towering figure in the life of the Nation, and when his intrepid soul took its flight to God the House of Representatives lost its most militant and masterful Member. No man ever occupied a more commanding position in this Chamber, and no one who ever served here left a deeper or more lasting impression upon the legislation of his day and generation.

His untiring industry and intellectual versatility were the marvel of his colleagues. No avenue of information was closed to him. He had explored all of the highways and byways of legislative knowledge, and the confusing labyrinth of parliamentary procedure was a plain and simple path for him. His powers of analysis were equaled by few and excelled by none. Intuitively his keen eye discovered the slightest defect in the substance and form of every bill presented for consideration. Fearlessly he turned the light of constructive criticism on every measure, no matter whether its author was friend or foe. His one and only purpose was to promote safe and sane legislation and to prevent the enactment of illy considered and loosely drawn laws. He was a statesman in the broadest and truest meaning of the term.

The venerable ex-Speaker of this House, Mr. CANNON, who presides over these deliberations to-day, once said that he regarded JAMES R. MANN as the most valuable and efficient legislator that he had ever known. This tribute, coming from one not given to extravagance of speech, and the soundness of whose judgment is recognized throughout the length and breadth of the Republic, was well merited. There was nothing artificial or superficial about JAMES R. MANN. He rang true at all times and under all circumstances. The mask of an actor never fitted him. He was free of all affectation, sincere and genuine throughout. He cared naught for popular applause, but followed always the path of duty outlined by a conscience that was ever responsive to the noblest and most patriotic impulses of true manhood.

One of the outstanding traits of his sterling character was his fine sense of justice and fairness. Unerring in his judgment of the capabilities of his fellow Members, he was always ready and willing to give credit where credit was due. None so quick as he to encourage the worthy and the deserving, and none so merciless in exposing sham and pretense. He believed that this Republic had more to fear from the cowardice of its public servants than from their possible corruption. In the honesty of his soul he could not conceal his supreme contempt for the man who would sacrifice principle for expediency. Pressing forward in the right, as God gave him to see the right, he unhesitatingly took a firm and determined stand on every great question of public policy, regardless of the effect on his own political fortunes. With full confidence in his own integrity of purpose, undisturbed by criticism or abuse, he was content to look for vindication to the impartial judgment of the future.

A born leader of surpassing energy, a master of strategy, courageous and defiant in every fiber of his being, he was singularly free of even a suspicion of vindictiveness. He never harbored malice and was quick to forgive and to forget. His failure to realize on the one great ambition of his useful and strenuous life left no trace of resentment in him. He never for a moment entertained the slightest ill-will for those upon whose friendship he felt that he had a right to depend in his contest for the speakership but who failed to give him the full measure of their support. With him the incident was closed at once and the mantle of charity was drawn around the act. Men who really knew him recognized his many robust virtues and admired them. They also discerned his faults, but merged them into his manly qualities, because he wore them both upon his breast. Of him it could be said in truth,

> His life was gentle and the elements
> So mixed in him that Nature might stand up
> And say to all the world, This was a man.

And now, in the city of Chicago, amid the familiar scenes of his ambitious young manhood, our beloved friend awaits the dawn of resurrection's morn. Tenderly and lovingly we laid him away on that chill December day, moistening the sods with our tears as they closed in above him, wondering who next would answer the final call. For him the mystery of mysteries has been solved. For him the mystic veil that separates the present from the hereafter has been swept aside and to his enraptured gaze there stand revealed the glories and the grandeurs of the eternal morn. Friend and colleague—

> We tell thy doom without a sigh,
> For thou art Freedom's now and Fame's,
> One of the few the immortal names
> That were not born to die.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I think you and I are the only Members of the House who can remember Mr. MANN when he first came here. He was a modest, black-haired and bearded man, with a sparkling and incisive manner, who at first made no pretension to prominence, and in whom we did not detect those qualities which later brought him to his unquestioned leadership. He waited, wisely, I think, until it came to him, as it sooner or later comes to every new Member of the House, to take part naturally in legislative proceedings. He watched and studied and mastered the habits and temperament of the House, and when he did take part before he finished every Member recognized that there was a man who knew his subject, and gradually that became his reputation. He was on the floor during his service probably more than any other man of my acquaintance, and always when speaking he impressed us with the fact that he had mastered the subject on which he was talking. I think that is a characteristic which probably is more appreciated and prized in this House than it is in the country at large. I think the country has a false idea of the proceedings of Congress. There seems to be a general opinion that the debates here are sensational and dramatic, and declamatory, and that the men who participate in such debates are the influential and leading men here. Those, of course, are the portions of our proceedings which fill the headlines of the papers, and the men who indulge in that sort of debate are the ones who are naturally noticed by the press because that is what interests their readers. The great mass of the people would not be interested in the ordinary course of the debates here. It is as much as they will do to consider the results of legislation.

The ordinary close, logical discussion which has influence with Members of the House and affects opinion here does not get to the public. Therefore, I think people have a false idea of the kind of debate that prevails in Congress, or, at least, in this branch of the Congress. I think we will all agree that what wins a man the attention and respect of this House in debate is to show that he has information on the subject he is discussing. Knowledge is what we want and will listen to. That is what influences opinion here, and that is what gains for a man the confidence and leadership of this House. And that is the way Mr. MANN earned his position. Beginning modestly and temperately, he soon showed us that he was watching with an intent and penetrating intellect all the legislation of the House, and little by little he participated more and more, until all the House on both sides was gradually convinced that he was a student and master of parliamentary procedure and of legislation. And when he had once gained that position he had the confidence of the House, and he never lost it. His standing here illustrated the old maxim "Knowledge is power." Under Mr. CANNON'S speakership he had so won his way, and the House so recognized his ability that although he was not the nominal leader, yet he was the real representative of the Speaker and the dominating force upon the floor.

How he had time to acquire his wonderful knowledge of all legislation I never could understand. I can not see how he could have given any time to pleasure, or to miscellaneous reading, or to anything except the business of this House, for he always read every bill and every report. That acute intellect of his at once detected error, large or small, and as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] suggested, he was merciless in exposing such errors, but he did it not from vindictive feeling toward the author but because he wanted the legislation of this House to be as nearly perfect as he could help to make it.

When Mr. MANN became minority leader he was in his glory, because then all this long study and habit of watching and criticizing came into full play and was exactly the quality which is demanded in a minority leader. Always fair, always respected by the other side, yet he was always feared, because they were sure that there was no error which they might commit that would escape his vigilant eye.

Although perhaps he was not more versed in parliamentary law than some other men, yet his accumulated knowledge of the rules and parliamentary precedents was so stored and arranged in his capacious mind that when any question came up he instinctively saw its solution, and without reference to books he at once logically detected the error or the strength of the position and could at once either criticize or support. His memory was wonderful and his knowledge always at his immediate command. Mr. Fitzgerald of New York was recognized as the leading parliamentarian on the other side, and he had a mind not unlike Mr. MANN'S in acuteness and strength. When these two men were discussing a question of parliamentary law the rest of us could listen and be sure that there was no possibility of any error or mistake being overlooked.

Mr. MANN also, with all his intellectual brightness, had a sound knowledge of mankind. He knew how to mix with us. He knew how to make friends. He had a very wise appreciation of the motives that influenced the actions of men and how to appeal to them, and this made him wise as a leader and agreeable as a companion. He was absolutely fearless, shunned no contest, and had the self-confidence which his successful experience justified. He was courageous in his opinions, as well as in debate; he formed them independently and deliberately and stood by them manfully, and when sure in his own mind that he was right disregarded consequences. That district is rich and eminent which is represented here by a man of such wisdom, such fairness, such courage, such indefatigable industry, and such indomitable will as JAMES R. MANN.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, our friend and colleague, to whose memory we pay tribute to-day, exhibited in his life and character a rare combination of the sterner virtues essential to a truly useful career and of those finer and more tender qualities which appeal to the heart and imagination, smooth the rough places in the road of life, and cement enduring friendships. Courage was his outstanding quality, a courage that never faltered and that was most conspicuous at times when men of less heroic fiber would have been tempted to yield and compromise. It is the quality most needful in the forum of this House, in which our friend rendered long and most distinguished service, and he possessed it to a marked degree.

But courage avails little here unless its possessor can give sound reason for the faith and facts on which his courage finds a firm foundation, and a firm foundation in a field of controversy and conflicting opinion can only be secured by intelligent and untiring industry in the fields of logic, theory, and fact. Next to courage, therefore, the most important qualities for high service, in the field in which our friend served so worthily, are industry and thoroughness, and these essential qualities he possessed most abundantly. No question was too complex, no problem too difficult, no undertaking too laborious for him. Difficulties, perplexities, far from daunting him, were but inspirations to his zeal and spurs to his industry. No problem was too great, no detail too small, to discourage his industry or escape the microscopic search of his thoroughness.

But courage, and industry, and thoroughness, indispensable as they are to high and helpful achievement in the public service, would be of little value in the running of the years unless supported and accompanied by the virtues of honesty and integrity, and with these virtues our friend and colleague was superbly endowed, and thus endowed it is not surprising but inevitable that his public service was of the highest and the finest character, that he left a record of faithful and effective service, the benefit of which will be permanent and lasting.

I have referred first to those qualities of Mr. MANN with which the world was best acquainted, by which, in the main, the world judged him, but those who knew him well and had the rare privilege of a close personal acquaintance admired him for virtues of the heart and mind of which the world at large knew little. He was a lover of nature, he was passionately fond of plants and flowers, and he found his recreation, his relief from the strain of public duty, his cure for mental worry and physical ill in the open and among the plants and flowers which in beauty of form and color and fragrance reveal the glory of the Great Creator.

No man had a warmer heart, a finer sympathy, or was capable of deeper or more enduring friendships than our departed friend and colleague. Those who knew him only as the diligent student of legislation, as the uncompromising opponent of measures of which he disapproved, and saw him only in legislative action, in which he was no respecter of persons, could hardly be expected to glimpse, to know, or even suspect, his friendly and sympathetic character, his strong attachments, his sincere friendships, his kindly and tender heart. Those of us who knew him long and well were privileged to be informed of this engaging side of his character, to know that he had a heart as tender and sympathetic as that of a child and that his friendship embraced men of all views and of all opinions.

I recall an incident that occurred a short time ago, related to me by one of our colleagues who was privileged to witness it. A member of the opposition, with whom our friend had often come in vigorous verbal combat, had been unsuccessful in the conflict of politics and was to leave the House at the end of this term. He and Mr. MANN stood near where I now stand. Mr. MANN placed his hand on his shoulder and said "I am sorry you are going; it is a great loss to the House and it is a great personal loss to me. I feel the loss of a good and true friend," and as he spoke his voice trembled and tears, prompted by a warm and sympathetic heart, glistened in his eyes. Thus he stood for a moment and then turned and on the instant was in the thick of the debate, as though he felt it necessary to check the further expression of his kindly heart by engaging in the engrossing affairs of the House. In a moment no one would have suspected that sentiments of friendship and kindliness had an important influence on his service here.

A great and good man has passed from the activities of life to the great beyond. He has left behind him a record of splendid service and an influence that is far-reaching for good. We sincerely mourn and regret his passing, but we know that whatever lies beyond the veil, for such a heart and soul all will be well.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it is difficult for those who knew Hon. JAMES R. MANN as a public servant to speak of him in terms that will not seem extravagant to those who did not so know him.

Personally, I think it may be justly claimed for him and truly said of him that he was the most thorough, the most careful, and in most respects the most capable legislator of his generation. In saying this I do not mean that I agreed with all his legislative ideas and policies. Of course, I did not. What I have in thought is his wonderful knowledge of legislative nomenclature, his remarkable skill in producing the correct legislative terminology, and his almost uncanny capacity for familiarizing himself with the intimate details and fundamental purport of every legislative proposition, together with his complete mastery of the rules and practices of Congressional procedure.

We have had during the last two decades many Representatives who were thorough masters of some one legislative subject, as, for instance, the tariff, appropriations, claims, constitutional matters, departmental affairs, or others. We have had not a few who were thorough as to more than one of these. It is not putting it too strongly to say that Mr. MANN was thorough upon practically all.

I have heard it suggested a number of times that the very completeness of his knowledge, or, rather, his disposition promptly to use that knowledge, served somewhat to militate against his popularity while he was the titular leader of his party in the House. He knew all the subjects that arose so well; he was always so thoroughly prepared; he had in such marked degree the power of quick analysis and clear, concise statement, as that not infrequently he would supplant members of a committee presenting legislation to the House and himself take charge, to their practical exclusion.

This naturally produced a certain amount of irritation on the part of his party associates, but from the standpoint of the public service his tremendous work was invaluable.

Others have reviewed his legislative record minutely and I shall not attempt to do so. Probably more legislative acts stand to his credit than to that of any other representative in our national history.

He was not ornate in speech, but clear, concise, and pointed. He did not seek to show the graces of oratory, yet many of his utterances were finely eloquent.

He was a superior debater, because of his knowledge of the subject; he feared no antagonist; felt himself able to meet any man upon any ground. He offered battle without hesitation and accepted it when offered by another with delight. Of course, he was meticulously honest intellectually as well as in every other way. Any agreement made by him was kept to the letter.

I remember saying of him once in the course of a debate just at the end of the Sixty-fifth Congress:

> This (the Democratic) side of the House sometimes hates the gentleman; it often loves the gentleman; it always respects the gentleman.

The first proposition was an exaggeration; he did exasperate us frequently but we never hated him. The others were literally true.

His personal side was charming. He was a good conversationalist; he had poetry in his soul; he loved trees and birds and flowers and all the beautiful things of the good God's creation.

I can not claim so intimate an acquaintance with him as many of his colleagues can, but I knew enough to know of his fine home life and the deep devotion and love which grew and flourished there.

He was a really great man. No public matter was too small to escape his attention and analytic scrutiny, nor any too large to cause an instant's hesitation in the effort to solve it and solve it right.

Patriot, statesman, loyal friend, devoted lover, untiring worker for thy country's weal, good-by, and peace be thine for all eternity. Thy counterpart we are not likely to see.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege perhaps to know our departed friend longer than any man here. I knew him as a boy, I knew him in his young manhood and in his mature manhood. It was my privilege to be closely associated with him in all the activities through life. I saw him in his daily coming and going, I watched him when he began to succeed. He was full of vigor, he was ambitious, he was active, he was clean. Early in his life he attracted the attention of the people who lived in the community where he resided. He inspired their confidence and their esteem. He was trusted, he was called to assume important missions.

I lived in the city of Chicago just at the southern border line. He lived in the village of Hyde Park, which began across the street from where I resided. Hyde Park was one of the most interesting suburbs in Chicago. He became its village attorney. As such he put Hyde Park on the map. It was known throughout our State as one of the great coming communities, and all through the activities of JAMES R. MANN. He was instrumental in developing this suburb into a great residential territory the like of which did not exist anywhere else in America.

When Hyde Park was annexed to Chicago he was elected to the city council. He was an active force there. We served there together. He made a record as a member of the Chicago City Council of which everybody in our State was proud. His reputation as a city legislator became State-wide. He was in great demand as an orator; he made speeches everywhere throughout the State at the demand of the people. He was always listened to with interest. What he said was educational. He inspired confidence in the people everywhere. He was ruggedly honest. Everybody knew him to be incorruptible. No man dared approach him with a shady suggestion, either in his young manhood or at any other time during his life. He had a courage that was all his own, and he never faltered in the determination to carry out what he had in mind. He had no fear of opposition; he rather invited it because it brought out the best there was in him.

His record in the city council was such that the people of the district which he so long and well represented here invited him to take his place in this House. He was elected without opposition. He came, and he did his duty here as elsewhere. He soon attracted the notice of the membership of the House by his aggressive fearlessness, his constancy to duty, and his unselfish devotion to the Nation's good.

He was a master of English. He had an analytical power all his own. He knew if there was a mistake made, no matter how slight in composition, that might be embraced within a bill. He was unrelenting in his opposition to hypocrisy and he had no use for demagogues. He was an American for America. He sought no plaudits; he felt that all the compensation needed by a man in public office was being fortified by the consciousness of his own rectitude. That was the compensation Mr. MANN always hoped for, and that is the compensation he carried with him every day. He was satisfied if when he was alone he knew that he was in respectable company. He would prefer to have his own approval of himself than to have the approval of any critic that might be brought to bear upon his work. No man in all the history of the Congress made a record superior to that made by Mr. MANN. He was the master of legislation, the master of parliamentary usages as applied here. It was always a marvel to me how he could accomplish what he did accomplish; how he could know what he knew; how he could find the time to study problems with which he was familiar; I always wondered how he had the time to analyze and criticize and debate all the great matters that came before this House for consideration. I think he had more influence in this House than any other man. He had no committee assignments in the last years of his service. Some people think committee assignments give them power.

Mr. MANN did not require committee assignments to give him power. His knowledge of the problems of the Nation and his untiring energy and industry and his ability to present the facts in any case gave him the power which he had, and it was superior to that of any other man I ever knew.

There was never a time in this House when he needed to exercise power that he could not do it. He was modest, he did not assume anything. He was the master of facts, he was the master of statement, he was the master of analysis, and the master of himself. He had no ambition. He did not care to be the Speaker of the House. He had that ambition once, but I knew from his own lips later that if it could be tendered to him without opposition he would not accept it. He wielded more power than any Speaker, as a simple Member of the House. He earned the right to wield it because of his devotion to the work. He made a record that will not be equaled and surely not surpassed. We have seen men come and go, brilliant men. We have read the record of those who have gone before and they have had a great national reputation, but no matter what the reputation of any man may have been as the result of his service here he earned no greater right to a national reputation than that which Mr. MANN obtained on account of his services in this House. We do not come here to mourn his death. It is as natural to die as it is to live.

We come here to recount his work and to tell the story of his achievements, safe in the belief that his work will live and his life will be emulated by the generations yet to come. He has left a record of which every child of the coming generation may well be proud, and if those who come after will but follow in the footsteps of JAMES R. MANN they will be sure to be Americans. After all, what greater accomplishment can a man achieve in life than to leave the story of such a record printed in the pages of the Nation's history? I shall not say good-by, because I believe in a future. We are not to be here long, we will soon pass on, and my hope is that we will be able once again, where strife is unknown, to meet our beloved colleague on the other shore.

Under the leave to extend remarks Mr. MADDEN submitted the following address delivered by Mr. MAGEE, of New York, at the Republican conference, February 27, 1919:

Mr. MAGEE. I rise to second the nomination of Mr. MANN for Speaker. I have nothing to say against the other candidates, whom I hold in the highest esteem. I make no comment upon the attitude of any of my colleagues in respect to the speakership. I merely speak as I feel about the matter.

I hold no brief for Mr. MANN. He needs none. His long conspicuous record of service in the House speaks for itself.

I favor his nomination because he has earned the speakership. That no one who is familiar with his arduous and eminent public service in the House will deny. He has fought the battles of the Republican Party upon the floor of the House when the Democratic majority in the House was greater than the Republican membership.

I favor his nomination because as a parliamentarian and legislator he has no peer in the House. Consequently he is the best fitted Member of the House for Speaker. That no one who knows him and has observed his marvelous ability will deny.

I favor his nomination because he has been repeatedly the nominee of the Republicans of the House for Speaker. As minority leader in the House his health became impaired by reason of extraordinary devotion to his public duties, and we should be happy to honor him now when he has come back to us restored to health and resumed his position as minority leader. It is inconsistent to nominate him when the nomination was but an empty honor and to deny him the nomination when his nomination means his election.

The criticism in the public press of his pre-war record should not control our votes. Nearly two years ago we voted almost unanimously for him with his pre-war record directly before us, and I have neither heard nor read of any criticism of our action. On April 2, 1917, he received 205 Republican votes for Speaker.

We know that since the United States entered the World War there has been no more militant patriot in the House than the distinguished gentleman from Illinois. He has been more than generous in his support of the administration during the war, and has repeatedly in the pit of the House strongly urged his colleagues to put aside all partisanship, and even personal views, and give to the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy the legislation demanded by him for the vigorous and successful prosecution of the war. In any action which he took prior to our entry into the war we know that he acted from conscientious motives and had the courage of his convictions. Surely it has not been a tenet of the Republican Party to punish a man who has the courage to express his convictions and to stand fearlessly for what he believes to be right, but if it is now, under the new creed, and under the new management of the Republican Party, then every one of the 50 Members of the House who voted against war was fundamentally wrong, and must be forever condemned in the minds and hearts of his countrymen, and bear an indelible stain that no degree of fervent patriotism, even upon the field of battle, and no degree of efficient public service anywhere, can wear away.

We need not worry about the shadow of 1920. Under the existing rules of the House the Speaker has little power. The House selects all standing committees and in these committees lies the real power of the House. In legislation the majority leader has practically dominating power.

We know that the issues in the momentous campaign of 1920 will not be determined by the distribution of the patronage of the House, but by what we do as legislators during the period of reconstruction. If we institute and carry to completion much needed reforms; if we legislate wisely and in the public interest upon the great questions that will come before us for consideration and solution; if we cause drastic retrenchment in public expenditures; if we show ourselves to be capable, efficient, and worthy of public confidence, the millions of thoughtful quiet voters sitting by the firesides in their homes throughout the United States will heartily approve our action in 1920, just as they have approved our action during the past two years under the leadership of Mr. MANN. The people of this country look to the Republican Party for safety, for security, and for the adoption and promulgation of policies that will promote the welfare, progress, and prosperity of the American people.

In this connection I may be permitted to remind you that every war that this country ever had has produced its President. The Revolutionary War produced Washington, the War of 1812 Jackson, the Mexican War Taylor, the Civil War Grant, the Spanish-American War Roosevelt, and this war, the greatest of all our wars, will produce its President. It is possible that some popular military man, nominated in 1920 by the Republican Party, will be the next President of the United States.

We know that as long as Mr. MANN remains a Member of the House he will dominate the House by reason of his indefatigable industry and great ability as a parliamentarian and legislator. What do his opponents in this contest propose to do with him? That is a fair question and sincerity demands a fair answer. Do they propose to relegate him to the political scrap heap? If so, my answer is that they have not the power. That power lies only in the voters of his district and they have too much sense to exercise it.

We know what our plain duty is. We know what simple justice demands that we do. Why not have the courage of our convictions? I make no professions of statesmanship, but, if I read history aright, no real statesman ever kept his ear to the ground listening for public clamor. Rather men of vision blaze the trail and clear the way for progress. The foundation of every bulwark ever created affecting human rights that has stood the test of time has been equity and justice.

Personal ambition leads to selfish acts. If we are to meet our country's needs, we must increasingly feel from day to day that the individual is nothing and that the Republic is everything. It is well to bear in mind that the pathway of personal ambition is strewn with physical and mental wrecks, and that we can best serve the Government by acting always fairly and justly.

If we deny Mr. MANN the speakership, we do an act of injustice to a man who by incomparable devotion to duty is entitled to the honor. No one can question his efficient service to his party and to his country; no one can question his ability and fitness for the office; and no one can advance any sufficient reason why we should not vote in accordance with our convictions.

We are on the threshold of power. Let us profit by the lessons of the past. Harmony should be the watchword, but may I warn you that the very basis of harmony is justice. We must not refuse honor to those who by reason of long years of arduous, faithful, and efficient public service deserve recognition. I refuse to do injustice to the man who has indisputably earned the speakership, and who concededly is the best-fitted man in the House for Speaker.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker—

"Man that is born of woman is of few days, and full of trouble. "He cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down; he fleeth also as a shadow, and continueth not."

How true! Our journey through life is short and uncertain, and sometimes we would rebel against the dispensation of an all-wise Providence who knoweth best. I confess that it was with a feeling somewhat akin to rebellion that I read of the untimely death of my friend, counselor, and benefactor, JAMES R. MANN, of Illinois, whose memory will remain green so long as life remains.

My acquaintance with Mr. MANN commenced early in 1917, and shortly after we first met I realized that he was a man of outstanding ability as a leader and legislator. He towered above his colleagues as Longs Peak towers above the other mountain summits in the Rockies. His knowledge of parliamentary practice was marvelous and no situation could arise which his keen intellect was not capable of solving. Mr. MANN was a remarkable man for detail and no measure was presented for consideration on the floor that he had not thoroughly mastered. The strong and weak points of the measure stood out in bold relief before his analytical mind and it was usually safe to accept his analysis without question.

When I came to Congress Mr. MANN was the minority leader and he was a peerless leader. It was a pleasure to follow him into conflict, and to see the gleam of battle in his eyes was a treat for the gods. Though I live to be a thousand I will never forget his masterful generalship in a certain election contest which engaged the time of the House in the closing hours of the Sixty-fifth Congress—when he turned a minority into a majority and a threatened defeat into a triumphant victory. His conspicuous record in this body, which covered a period of nearly twenty-four years, is replete with like performances, and it is no exaggeration to say that he is one of the outstanding characters of the legislative history of the Republic.

Some one has said that republics are ungrateful. I will leave it to the historian to take issue with that statement. It is a significant fact that such overtowering giants as Webster, Clay, Calhoun, Blaine, Reed, and MANN should fail to grasp the prize which they most desired and which they had earned by reason of service and outstanding ability. Mr. MANN failed to realize his ambition to become presiding officer of the House of Representatives. If he was disappointed over his failure to win that high place, he was too big to show it. If he harbored any feeling against men from whom he had every right to expect support and who failed him in his hour of need, no one ever saw any indication of his resentment; in fact, his friends showed their feelings over his defeat much more than he. To him it was all a part of the game, and he cheerfully went on helping wherever he could by his wise counsel and great experience. I served on the committee on committees with Mr. MANN, and I can truthfully say that not once in making up the committees of this House did he allow any personal feeling that he might have had to carry the slightest weight. He measured every candidate by the yardstick of ability, and his sole object was to place each Member on the committee to which he was best adapted and where he could render the best service. That was the kind of man whom we are to-day mourning.

Notwithstanding the fact that Mr. MANN died full of years and honors, his departure was most untimely. Not since the reconstruction days that followed the Civil War has the need for men true and tried been so great as the present, and in his death the Republic lost a most valued and useful servant. Had he been permitted to remain with us a while longer, he would have brought to the problems confronting the country and Congress a wisdom that had been ripened by experience. As time goes on we will realize more and more the tremendous loss which we sustained in his death, but his memory should give strength to our determination to do that which is for the best interests of the country we all love.

Farewell, true and noble friend, farewell. My memory of you will ever remain one of the bright and cherished spots of my life.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, with the passing of JAMES R. MANN this House lost its ablest Member and the country its most useful legislator. This may seem a strong statement, even savoring of exaggeration, but I think that there is no one here who served with him, as I have, during the past 20 years, who will question its accuracy.

I am speaking, too, as one who disagreed with him more than once on matters of public policy, who declined more than once to follow his leadership, and who supported another in the contest four years ago for the speakership. Yet by and large, in season and out of season, whether or not I happened to be with him at the moment, I always thought and so expressed myself, and I think now, that MANN was the ablest and most useful legislator that this country has produced in the last quarter of a century.

From the economic standpoint alone his services to the country were above price.

No raid upon the Treasury was planned or undertaken which did not meet in him an insuperable obstacle in its path. For years he stood like a mountain of granite between the Treasury and its would-be despoilers. No one will ever know, none of us who served with him for years would attempt to guess, how much money he as a lone individual is directly responsible for saving to the people of the United States, but I have no hesitation in saying that it would run into the millions if not into the hundreds of millions of dollars.

Work, hard, laborious, intensive, was with him a passion. In his legislative life the days were none too long, the nights were all too short, for he worked almost continuously. To him the midnight oil was a luxury, for he loved his work, and it was a work for the most laudable of all purposes—the benefit of the American people.

As a consequence of his amazing energy and application he became within a few years after his election to Congress a master legislator and a superparliamentarian and remained so until the last.

I have often heard it said of him, and I think with much justice, that there were few bills which came upon this floor, the contents and effect of which were not mastered by him more thoroughly than by the man who introduced the bill or the committee that reported it.

If he had a fault as a legislator it was that he worked too hard and tried to do too much. I used to think that as leader of his side of the House he might well have left more to his lieutenants. But his intellect was so keen, his knowledge of details, even to the minutest, so extraordinarily comprehensive, that he often chafed under restraint and was unable to resist taking full charge of the proceedings.

This sometimes led to altercations with his own friends, who felt that they were being ignored and deprived of the opportunity for the exhibition of their talents if they had any.

I plead guilty to having had that feeling myself at times, which I voiced upon one occasion on the floor of the House. It was in 1910, I think, at any rate shortly after the beginning of the Taft administration, that Mr. MANN had criticized severely, and, as I thought, unjustly, the official acts of a recent appointee of the President who happened to come from my district. During the debate which followed, entirely good natured in character, I said:

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois is one of the most useful Members of this House. [Applause.] He is an indefatigable and untiring worker, and his efforts always make for good legislation. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois undertakes to play the rôle of Hamlet in this House, and he does it with skill, grace, and tact, and I think that no one will begrudge him that rôle, but when, Mr. Chairman, he undertakes not only to play Hamlet, but the fair Ophelia and the King and the Queen and first grave digger and sometimes, as now, carries a spear, he might be criticized for carrying the thing too far. [Laughter.]

This, of course, was airy badinage, and yet I think was not an overdraft of the position often assumed by Mr. MANN when he was in the height of his physical vigor, for he was easily, when he chose to exert his powers, the dominant figure in the House of Representatives.

It may be that history will not record his name in connection with the authorship of very many important acts of Congress, but we here know that there have been few pieces of legislation of major importance acted on by this House in the last 20 years that have not borne in some degree the impress of his magic touch.

As a parliamentarian in all that term implies he stood alone. It is given to few men, no matter how long their service in this House, to achieve the distinction of becoming a parliamentarian of the first rank. I think that the number of those I have known could be pretty accurately measured by the number of years I have served here. Some of them may have known as much parliamentary law as he. One, perhaps, knew more. Asher Hinds sacrificed himself in the preparation of that monumental work which is to-day our textbook. But none knew as MANN did how to adapt his knowledge to a parliamentary situation suddenly arisen. His resourcefulness under such conditions was literally amazing, and his success in adapting the rules to meet the situation almost invariable.

From a party standpoint his loss to us upon this side of the aisle in the parliamentary struggles sure to come in the next Congress is wholly irreparable.

I have attempted nothing more, Mr. Speaker, in these brief remarks than to state in plain and simple language my estimate of the abilities and the value of the public services of this extraordinary man. I am confident, however, that these views, inadequately expressed though they may be, are the views of the men who have had the privilege of serving with him in Congress and that they will meet the sanction of history.

In concluding may I express the hope that when his life's partner, who loved him well and was by him well beloved, shall read the record of these proceedings her grief may be in some degree tempered by the knowledge, which they clearly evidence, of the respect, admiration, and affection in which he was held by the men who knew him best, his colleagues in the House of Representatives of the United States.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I can not permit this opportunity to pass without expressing my very great admiration and esteem for our late colleague, the Hon. JAMES R. MANN, and paying a brief but heartfelt tribute to the distinguished and splendid service which he rendered his country during his nearly 26 years of service in this body.

It was a very great privilege to have served with him in the Halls of Congress. When I first came to Congress, nearly 14 years ago, the House was Republican in majority and Mr. MANN was then one of its recognized leaders. He endeared himself to me at that time by his kindly courtesy, his wise and kindly advice, and his readiness to aid in my effort to secure certain legislation which was greatly needed for the district I represent. No new Member of either party ever appealed to Mr. MANN for advice or information or for help in a righteous cause that he did not cheerfully give it. He was a kindly man, ever ready to help a colleague in his problems of legislation when he believed such legislation to be right and proper. While he had a tongue which could, on occasion, thrust like a rapier in sharp debate, he was always considerate of those who applied to him for assistance.

At that time he possessed such a wonderful and intimate knowledge of the rules and procedure of the House, and such wide and accurate information as to legislation, enacted and pending, that he was easily a master in any debate in which he engaged. Two years later, when the House was Democratic in majority, his party colleagues, by common consent, made him the minority leader on the floor.

So great was his knowledge of parliamentary procedure, so sound his judgment, so thorough his preparation, and so implicit the confidence of his party associates that his leadership was never disputed during the eight years of Democratic control. His party colleagues followed him with unfaltering confidence and unswerving fidelity. And it was this same well-known honesty of purpose and devotion to duty, coupled with his rare ability as a legislator, which gave him strength with the Democratic side on all questions save those of a strictly partisan character.

He was a strong Republican, and an earnest partisan whenever the interest of his party was at stake, but he never permitted partisanship to interfere with his support of measures and principles in which he conscientiously believed. Courageous to a high degree, he took a broad statesmanlike view of all matters of legislation and was never swayed by any sort of sectional prejudice. There has not been a Member of either branch of Congress for many years who has left a greater impress upon the legislative records of his country. During his long years of service he helped to frame and pass many great constructive measures, one of which bears his name, and shows better than words can express that he was a man of broad humanity, high morals, and clean conduct, and that his sympathies were always with the weak and oppressed.

He was a great legislator—a splendid statesman. I do not believe there is a Member who will be so widely and sadly missed in the halls of legislation. When the unexpected news came that he had succumbed to the disease which had so recently attacked him, there was universal grief on both sides of the Chamber, for everyone realized that a great American, a most useful legislator and servant of the people, had passed out forever, and that the country had suffered a great and distinct loss.

He was an indefatigable worker and conscientious to a high degree. No legislation, however small or inconsequential it might appear to be, ever failed to receive his close scrutiny. He thoroughly mastered every detail of the many bills which came before Congress for consideration. He took his duties seriously. I have never known a man who gave such close attention to details, and it was this boundless energy and close study which caused his physical breakdown in the latter years of his life and compelled him for a time to leave his active duties on the floor and seek health elsewhere under the imperative orders of his physician. He was missed then as he is missed now, and when he came back, seemingly restored to health, Republicans and Democrats alike rejoiced that the House was once more to have the benefit of his wise advice and counsel.

He has now gone, never to return—unless it be that the spirits of those who have crossed over to the unknown shore are sometimes permitted to return to the scenes and places they loved while on earth. If so, I can fancy that his spirit will often hover over this Chamber, which he loved so well, and which was the scene of his arduous labors, his many mental combats, his defeats, and his many victories. The grim reaper has claimed him, Mr. Speaker, as he will sooner or later claim each one of us. No more will he smooth out tangled parliamentary situations and bring order out of chaos when the House finds itself in confusion; no more will we hear his voice raised in debate, but his memory will linger with those of us whose privilege it was to have served with him and to have shared his friendship, and his example of courage, industry, honesty, and intense devotion to duty and to country will always be an inspiration.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, to my mind little need to be said on this occasion. The best memorial to our late colleague is found in the words he helped to write into the laws of his land and the Constitution of his country. The records of this body for over a quarter of a century are full of the product of his matchless mind and his untiring energy. No man in that time has done as much as he to shape the policies and direct the activities of the Congress of the United States. No one, in this trying reconstruction period, could have done as much, by his leadership, to guide us safely over the rough places. But when we need JAMES R. MANN most grievously, silently and quickly he has folded his mantle about him and laid himself down to his everlasting sleep.

It is well for man to pause at times and contemplate the lives of great men. This man we memorialize to-day, my colleagues, was a great man. From his early manhood and entrance into public life his labors were indefatigable. Of the marvelous talents which God had given him he never gave in stinted measure, but poured out the last drop of all he had. Untiringly, for 26 years, he labored in this forum, always giving to every task all the energy he possessed. Out of the well of his industry and ability he drew unceasingly. There was no task too trifling, no detail too trivial, to receive his closest attention. No other man during his time knew as much about the business of the National House of Representatives as he. No other man was so helpful in its legislative procedure. No man was more constructive. In his time he prevented more bad legislation and aided in enacting more constructive legislation than any other man in the history of our times. At times when he was not even the chosen leader of his party in this House, he lead more of its membership, he influenced more of its action, than any other man in it.

I can not speak of our late colleague as an intimate of his. I did, however, on many occasions, go to him for counsel and for information. Like every other Member of the House I soon learned to admire and highly respect his wonderful knowledge and grasp of public questions, the depth and clarity of his vision, and the lofty public purposes he always had in view. He measured all things we do here by their ultimate effect upon the body politic. His viewpoint was not narrow or provincial but broad and elevated and commanding. He hated fraud and pretense and petty politics. Himself a scholar and a deep and painstaking student of the history of his country and its legislation, he had but little patience with him who would utilize the machinery of this great legislative body to which he belonged for trivial or selfish purposes.

In all my life I have not seen another man so true to his convictions and ideals as was Mr. MANN. He followed these convictions with absolutely no thought of self-interest. I recall one occasion when, angered at what some thought to be an injustice to him, he was urged to use the power he possessed to discipline those whom it was assumed had been responsible for his injury. With singular and inflexible fidelity to the principles he maintained to be correct, he rose above the vexations and disappointments of his own experiences and insisted upon the things he thought, in his own clear mind, to be best for the country.

There is a popular impression that men in public life treat their offices as private perquisites and not as public trusts. I have not found this to be true. The best example of its falsehood is the life of our late colleague. He considered his office as an entire submergence of his own individuality into his public duty. He gave up the wealth which he might have acquired in the practice of his profession, he gave up his health, his life, freely and unreservedly, in bearing the burden he felt rested upon his shoulders.

As we saw him dealing with the endless maze of legislative detail here, always active, always alive to every parliamentary move, I think that few of us realized what a sacrifice he was making. I only sensed it once or twice, when, in the hurly-burly of a House session, by some chance remark I drew aside, for a moment, the curtains and saw that his heart and soul were yonder in Illinois amid the singing birds and the pleasant odors of his own beloved flower garden.

We men from Illinois trusted him implicitly. He was our representative on the committee on committees. No one ever thought of questioning his judgment in the matters intrusted to him. We knew that our interests were safe in his hands. But we also knew that no request not based upon justice would receive any cooperation from him. He was a zealous and powerful advocate of the claims of his friends, but he insisted that his friends claim nothing but what was right. Our delegation and our State have suffered a most grievous loss. The broad prairies and the great cities of Illinois may and will produce other men whose names will be written into the history of the country, but men will come and men will go for generations before another takes the place of JAMES R. MANN.

Nothing that we may say or do here will further add to the luster of his fame or further enhance his high standing and prestige. He has erected a monument for himself that will last as long as there is a Congress of the United States. But we may with all propriety, by these simple services, indicate our sorrow at his passing. And so, Mr. Speaker, I voice my brief and humble tribute, with my colleagues, in memory of this great man.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable misgiving that I attempt a memorial address on this mournful day, when I recollect that only so recently and, oh, how often have these walls rung with applause and acclaim at the words of wisdom and leadership of that giant in parliamentary practice and legislative accuracy, Hon. JAMES R. MANN, late Representative from the Second Congressional district of Illinois.

It is quite probable that the world in 2,400 years since Socrates has not produced a single parliamentarian the superior to Mr. MANN, and it is also quite probable that his equal will not be again seen in this House during the lifetime of anyone present to-day.

For a thousand and one years to come many a parliamentary tangle in this House will be unraveled when some gentleman will arise in his place and quote Mr. MANN in an identical case.

He was more than a genius, he was almost superman, and with it all, never sought applause nor praise for that untiring zeal and duty he so willingly gave to his country.

Mr. MANN'S devotion to duty was a characteristic with which he was born and I doubt if there was, in the history of the country, another Member of Congress who worked as hard or who spent as many hours on the floor of the House in active participation in the work of the day as he did.

He was thorough to the merest detail, and one often wondered how he managed to obtain and hold knowledge of the hundreds of bills and resolutions which came before the House in rapid succession.

He invariably knew more about particular measures than the Member who drafted and presented them. He knew more about their effect on general legislation and was ever ready to lend his advice and assistance to those less conversant.

"JIM" MANN was the first member and friend I went to for advice when I came to Congress 10 years ago, and I feel his loss just as keenly as though he were my big brother. I loved him dearly as a friend.

No American soldier or sailor has given his life to his country more cheerfully than he has, and when I say that, I mean it, literally.

For 26 years Mr. MANN gave serious consideration and painstaking effort to the duties of his public trust, and in the end succumbed to the call from Him on high, his life's work well done.

His tremendous knowledge of all things parliamentary and legislative made him a debater of the highest order. His accuracy was rarely questioned.

The country can ill afford the loss of this conscientious, earnest, and faithful public servant.

The House has already missed his guiding hand.

Mr. MANN was a leader of men without being in any sense a so-called "boss," and I can now recall that he told me in confidence, one day some six years ago, that the publisher and owner of a great line of American newspapers and magazines had offered him his support for the Presidency.

He certainly measured up to the suggestion.

The life of JAMES R. MANN was one of true American manhood, worthy of emulation by all who love patriotism, righteousness, and truth.

May he rest in the peace he has so well earned.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, what I shall very briefly say is based upon my observation of Mr. MANN during the period after I became a Member of the House in June, 1919, when he was not then his party's leader as he had once been, but a conspicuous Member of the majority. It was then that the opportunity was afforded me of seeing him at work and of testing the correctness of the general opinion of the public which he so long served that he was in all things most exceptional. I soon realized that the public was not mistaken in its judgment, and I shall always remember him as the outstanding figure here; as certainly exceptional; as indeed astonishing in the range, the power, and the influence of his activities.

No one who served with him can forget how frequently when grave contests were being waged here, Mr. MANN, armed with all of the weapons which a great legislator should possess, would enter the struggle at the moment he deemed appropriate, and by the strength and perfection of his appeal to the House, give direction to the tide which had ebbed and flowed uncertainly. Time and again he was the chief actor in such a scene—a scene so vivid and picturesque that it might well have become the subject of the painter's art.

In his relation to the House, with regard to his familiarity with all the matters that came before it and his continuous and so often successful effort to have its business, as he viewed the situation, properly transacted, I believe that he more resembled Mr. Madison than any other who has had a notable career in this body.

I am permitted to state that my friend, Mr. Gaillard Hunt, the accomplished biographer of Madison, agrees with me that there is no exaggeration in holding that Mr. MANN is fairly comparable in many respects with that leading Member of the House in the first eight years of its existence. They were not unlike in intellectual strength and scope and the ability to grasp and understand any problem that was presented and quickly deal with it; in the extent of their reading and study of the history and functions of government and the retention for immediate use of the knowledge which they thus acquired; in their courage and unflagging industry; in their conception that it is the duty of a legislator to neglect no part of the province to which he belongs; in their gift of clear and analytical speech without useless elaboration, and with no attempt at rhetorical adornment. Mr. MANN'S work was more laborious than that of Madison as a Member of the House, because the latter belonged to a simpler era, when the controversies, although vitally important, were much less numerous and the responsibilities of Congress much less varied and complex. As in the case of any two individuals, the comparison fails at many points, and the historian may not accept it as at all worth while. And likewise the historian may perhaps make too little reference to the statesman who has just passed away. That also would have been the fate of Madison had his public life been confined to the House. He is unforgotten because, in another legislative field, he won the title of Father of the Constitution, which gives him undying recognition, and because he filled with distinction the office of Secretary of State and President in the formative period of the Union. Possibly some of us are now reflecting that Mr. MANN would have a larger place in history had he occupied high executive positions, where he could have impressed the country with his ability to administer as well as assist in making its laws, and I for one have no misgiving that in that event he would have shown administrative capacity corresponding with his legislative capacity.

It is for others who were intimately associated with him through long years to describe in detail his career here; to speak of the qualities that endeared him to his family and friends; to note the fact that he worked from an overwhelming sense of duty, but without allowing his work to warp him away from other interests; to note the fact in that connection that his main pleasure was in his home with those gathered about him whom he deeply loved, and in his garden and among his flowers where, detached from the clamor and conflict of public life, he was fascinated by the charm of carrying on the experiments of a true student of nature. They, too, will tell of his reverent religious attitude and of his faith that death is not the end of all but only the beginning of all that is best.

I have ventured to say a word or two to indicate my estimate of a most unusual character, and for the purpose of recording my grateful appreciation of his unvarying kindness to me as an inexperienced member of the House. As a Southerner and a Virginian, I am particularly glad to offer my poor tribute to his memory. He himself avowed that he was closely identified with the South. I find that in his first speech of any importance after entering the House—it was in February, 1898—he said:

> My father was a Southern-born man; my mother was a Southern-born woman. They both live in the South now. My wife's father and mother were both Southern-born, and are practically Southerners in feeling to-day.

He was a citizen of Illinois, but he was of Southern ancestry and traced his lineage in part to the Old Dominion, which ceded to the Federal Government the territory from which was carved the State of which he was the honored and far-famed representative.

Mr. COPLEY. Mr. Speaker, JAMES R. MANN was one of God's masterpieces. Endowed with the rudiments of a great mind, fired with an ambition in early youth, with untiring industry he developed that mind until it became the greatest legislative mental mechanism that ever sat in these halls. It was essentially a human mind. He had a great heart, it was intensely human. He loved his family and he loved his friends. He never hated his enemies, nor did he harbor vexation against them long. In his love for his friends he found a response, for they called him Jim. It was a term of affection, one which he himself liked better than any other. I stood with JAMES R. MANN at the bier of his only child, his son. He had a heart as great as any that ever throbbed in the breast of any human being. If I might presume to add to the beautiful words spoken over his casket in this hall, to the three attributes of honesty, courage, and thoroughness, I would suggest ability, and as a result of all of these, achievement. His was ability of an order perhaps never equaled before in its great mastery of the machinery of legislation, in any great legislative body in the world. It was instantly at his command. Not only was the scope of his knowledge beyond the understanding of the ordinary Member but the facility with which he could summon up that information was equally marvelous. He never used this great ability for his own personal aggrandizement, and he never used it to punish any of his enemies. He used it for one purpose only, to perfect the legislation that came from this body, which must in turn be reflected in the welfare of the people of this country.

His achievements were, of course, enormous. In the 12 years which I have been a Member of this House no one man, no half dozen combined, have had such influence upon legislation as had JAMES R. MANN. I think all will agree with me when I say that not one single measure that has ever come from this body ever been harmed by any act of his. Whether he favored it or not, if it became evident to him that it must become the law of the land, his every effort was put forth to make that law as perfect as possible. On the other side, anything that he put into legislation helped it, and it was his object in his legislative life to make the legislation, the work of this body, as perfect as possible, realizing, as he did, that it became the law of the land, under which he and his fellow citizens must live.

Mr. MANN was my friend. I had a most wholesome respect for his human attributes. At a time like this we do not want to discuss a man's faults. Of course he had them. He would not have been so human without them; but he had an almost superhuman attribute in that as soon as he had erred and had become conscious of it he was the first to admit it and the first to make it right. I shall personally miss Mr. MANN, as one of the great and lasting friendships of my life, but his impress will live in the legislation of the last 25 years, and his influence will go on down the countless years as an inspiration to other men to emulate his high purposes and his high achievements.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, in the galaxy of great men who have served their country in the last quarter of a century in Congress, no man was the peer of JAMES R. MANN, who in memorial services we meet to-day to honor.

Because of his exceptional and superior attainments that go to make the complete legislator, he was in a class by himself. He not only knew the Rules of the House better, and their philosophy, but he was an adept tactician in using them to advance good or block obnoxious legislation.

His eminence as a leader on the floor is acknowledged by all. The most notable of his recent achievements as master of House procedure was on the last day given to the consideration of the Fordney tariff bill, when time after time he overwhelmed the supporters of provisions of the tariff bill, that were supported by the committee, and succeeded in having adopted in each instance provisions of great moment to the country's economic policy in favor of lower tariff duties.

His acquaintance with all legislation that had been passed during his quarter of a century of service, and of the administrative workings of the Government was a marvel to members. This accomplishment was the result of his thorough study of every bill, no matter how minor, that was brought up for consideration in the House. His keen and ever alert mind made possible the utilization of his wonderful storehouse of legislative knowledge in proposing amendments and securing their adoption, and in passing bills through the House. Supplementing this rare gift of full knowledge of legislative procedure and enactments, he was the most powerful debater of his time. His quickness at repartee was unmatched. His shafts of sarcasm penetrated the armor of every antagonist. His power of concise expression enabled him to say more in a few minutes than many Members could say in multiples of the allotted time.

The traits that made him great on the floor made him equally superior in the committee room. As chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce more substantive legislation was reported during his incumbency than I have ever known before or since.

During the holiday recess of 1909 and 1910 it was my privilege to sit at the table by his side and assist in a minor way in the preparation of the draft bill amending the Interstate Commerce Act, which later upon passage bore his name. Throughout those days of careful preparation, were manifested the traits that enabled him to draft in concise language provisions that had to stand, after enactment, the test of the ablest attorneys of powerful railroads. There I learned of his thorough acquaintance with every detail of railroad legislation. It was this bill, during its stormy consideration of two weeks in the House, that was subject to the savage attacks of the insurgent group led by NORRIS, POINDEXTER and others that won him the greatest laurels as the faithful friend of the shipping public.

When this Mann Interstate Commerce bill came back from the Senate, laden down with amendments proposed by the insurgent group under the leadership of Dolliver of Iowa, the insurgents of the House voted unitedly with almost united Democratic support to accept the Senate amendments and opposed the motion of Mr. MANN to have it sent to conference. For three-quarters of an hour he pleaded with the Republican Members, and promised that if the bill were sent to conference it would come back to the House a better bill than as amended by the Senate. His plea was futile in securing any support from the insurgent group, but to his lasting credit the bill that emerged from conference was admitted in a speech by the leader of the insurgents to be a better bill than as it left the Senate.

No harder struggle for the attainment of provisions that would meet the demands of the shipping public was ever waged than during the five weeks while this bill was in conference. The Senatorial group, under the leadership of the late Senator Elkins, appealed—but in vain—to President Taft for support to a modification of some of the provisions demanded by Mr. MANN. But Mr. MANN was insistent to the President that the bill should reflect the requirements of the time and the demands of the shipping public, and his will was followed.

For five weeks in conference at the close of a long session, during which, as Chairman of the Commerce Committee, he had reported and passed the Mann White Slave Act, the Mann Interstate Commerce Amendment Law, the bill for the government of the Panama Canal Zone, the reorganization of the Lighthouse Service, and many other important measures, he had waged one of the greatest fights of his life without restoring rest at night, and came out triumphant in his fight for progressive railroad legislation.

Tired in mind and body after this exhausting work, he went to the seashore for a couple of weeks' rest, there to go through a strange mental metamorphose in seeking relaxation and the attainment to normal, after having driven the mental engine to the maximum of performance, as was his wont during each session of Congress.

Though warned again and again by his close friends that he was calling upon nature's reserve force too regularly, session after session, to have repaired the ravages that come with close attention and confinement to legislative work, in July, 1917, a few months after our entrance into the war, broken from the exhausting work attendant as minority opposition leader during the prior seven years, he left the House to repair to his garden of peonies in the suburbs of Chicago and there regain his health. After an absence of 16 months from his post he returned with his health restored.

After he had given his best for 20 years as a faithful servant of the Republic, the tragedy in congressional annals occurred in his being renounced by his party associates as candidate for Speaker.

The only explanation that ever has been made of the unheard of intrusion of the Senatorial group, headed by the late Senator Penrose, in forcing their State delegations' support away from Mr. MANN, was that if elected Speaker they feared, by reason of his tremendous attainments, he would become a formidable candidate for the Presidency in shaping the legislative policy of Congress.

He sought the Speakership, not for the honors of the position alone, but—as he told a few personal friends—to lead in the enactment of progressive legislation for the benefit of his party and country. Though righteously disappointed at the turn of affairs, in being rejected for the high honor of Speaker, he showed his greatness as controller of committee assignments, on the reorganization of the House under Republican control in the Sixty-sixth Congress, to place Members according to their worth and without any trace of any desire to punish those who had opposed him. He was too great a patriot, too big a man to degrade his position of premiership as director of legislative policies to treasure political grievance or animosity.

He was my friend. With no man in my Congressional service was I more closely associated, both legislatively and personally, than with JAMES R. MANN. I prize the ties of friendship formed years back and welded into enduring ties with the passing of years.

Great was JAMES R. MANN in life. To me his life and work will be an exemplar and inspiration until the end of my days of all that is noblest in a faithful disciple of public trust. No man was his peer, no man ever measured up to his stature of commanding eminence.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I had a deep and peculiar affection for our colleague, Mr. MANN, and I have felt his loss very keenly. As I turn back to the beginning of our acquaintance, I recall the somewhat unusual circumstance that the first two times I ever saw him I was seeking advice.

When I finished my course of studies at a law school here in Washington and was about to go forth looking for a suitable place to practice my profession, I had many misgivings. One of my teachers, afterward a member of the Supreme Court, suggested that I go to Chicago and see Mr. MANN who was then, or had been, one of the successful members of the Chicago bar. I went to Chicago and saw him. I shall never forget his kindly manner nor his encouraging suggestions.

Fifteen years later I saw him the second time when I came to Washington as a member elect of the Sixty-fourth Congress, and again I called on him for counsel. On both occasions he talked to me as would a father to his son, and the years have proven to me that his counsel was both wise and valuable.

I was impressed with his sincerity of purpose, his devotion to whatever task duty called him, and his willingness, even eagerness to help others who sought his help, and especially those who were just entering the most trying time of life's labors. My association with him as a member of the House through the years since then has confirmed and convinced me of the impressions I then received.

I said I had a peculiar affection for him. He was one of the few men for whom I have felt a real affection, who never did anything personal for me that would ordinarily inspire affection or gratitude. Aside from the advice that I had sought, he never did me a personal favor that I know of. But he possessed that unusual power of making others like him, of compelling the respect and admiration and even the affection of his associates, because, I believe, of his very strength and sturdiness of character, his untiring devotion to duty, his courage of convictions, his loyalty to the ideals of our Republic, and his unusual efficiency as a public servant. I have often heard Members praise him and even express their affection for him, who had more than once been the victims of his forensic strength and strategy, his keen cutting sarcasm or his unerring knowledge of parliamentary principles and precedents. Neither persons or personal favors ever swayed him from his straight course toward the best interests of our Government.

If by some power we could glean from the records of Congress the assembled public labors of all of our legislators since the beginning of the Government, and could pass them in review before us, I believe it would appear that those of Mr. MANN would exceed all others in amount, if not in value, to the Government. He always chose the difficult course, and he toiled without ceasing; opposition was to him an inspiration; and with it all, I do not believe he ever cast what we sometimes call an expedient vote.

In one respect at least he was a most fortunate man. He represented an intelligent constituency who recognized his ability, respected his judgment, and did not attempt to dictate his views or control his freedom of action. He, therefore, could and did freely, conscientiously, and unselfishly devote his best thoughts and labors to the service of the entire country. What a fortunate position is this for one who is chosen for the responsibility of making laws for a great nation.

Mr. Speaker, I did not have the privilege of enjoying a very personal or intimate acquaintance with Mr. MANN. My association with him was never of a personal character, but was that only of a colleague and fellow Member of the House. There are so many older Members here who knew him longer and perhaps who knew him better, I would feel it an intrusion to take more time on this solemn occasion than to very briefly pay my humble tribute to him for whom I always felt the most profound admiration.

Mr. MANN was one of the most unselfish men I ever knew either in private or public life. If he ever spoke or acted with a view to his own personal profit or advancement I was unable to detect it. He was the highest type of public servant it was ever my privilege to know.

His whole public career was a splendid exemplification of the highest conception of service, or, perhaps I should say, of public service.

No armored soldier advancing under the inspiration of martial music ever served his country more unselfishly or more courageously than did JAMES R. MANN, both in war and in peace. Those who had the opportunity to observe him from day to day during the more recent years have observed how his strong, manly form was bending and breaking under the burden of service, and believe, as I do, that he truly gave his life to the service of his country.

We need him and we miss him here. The country needs him and will sorely miss him. We are yet too near the time and scene of his service to properly appraise him. But I do not believe there has ever sat in this Chamber a more valuable legislator or a more useful public servant than was Mr. MANN.

It was a most unhappy day, not only for those of us who for the time were his associates here, but for the country he so long and faithfully served, when there came the last muffled roll call that summoned him from his labors in this vale of tears to answer in another and more peaceful chamber on the other side of the divide.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, when I came into the House of Representatives as a new Member 10 years ago I soon came to know Hon. JAMES R. MANN, then minority floor leader, and I shall always retain the impressions then formed of his splendid characteristics and remarkable abilities. All who served with him here remember the keen alertness, the earnestness, and the assiduous industry with which he performed his legislative duties. Mr. MANN technically assumed the office of minority leader at the beginning of the Sixty-second Congress, but to all intents and purposes he had been the real leader long before that time. Almost immediately upon his entrance to Congress, 24 years ago, he began to manifest qualities of leadership and take a place of influence in the proceedings. By his quick mastery of the rules of parliamentary procedure, his sincerity and keen insight into the merits or demerits of measures offered for consideration, as well as by his readiness in debate and activity on the floor, he early became recognized as one who could and would be a leader. Thus it came about that quite a long time before he became titular leader of his own party on the floor he was a sort of de facto leader, whose judgment was highly regarded and whose advice was sought on nonpolitical questions by Members on both sides of the Chamber.

It was characteristic of Mr. MANN's leadership that he loved a square fight, was unyielding, a fighter who called a spade a spade, showed no quarter, brooked no interference, and hit hard and often. He was punctilious down to the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t." Yet he possessed a kindly nature and broad sympathies. No leader ever had a firmer grip upon the business of legislation. He was thoroughly informed concerning every bill that came up for consideration, whether a great tariff measure or a private pension bill. Frequently he knew more about a pending bill than the chairman of the committee having it in charge. Nothing attracts the attention of the House quicker than real information, and Mr. MANN always had it.

The duties of a floor leader in the House of Representatives are manifold and the position is one of great responsibility. It is of the utmost importance, not only from a party standpoint but in the interest of public business that men possessing peculiar fitness should be chosen by each political party in the House to act as field marshal and as mentor and guide on the floor. The position is one not easily filled, requiring in its occupant a high degree of alertness, resourcefulness, and tact combined with readiness in debate and thorough parliamentary knowledge. Leadership as here comprehended involves at least three elements, political, parliamentary and legislative. The chairmanship of the Ways and Means Committee, controlled by the majority, has with few exceptions carried with it the responsibility and distinction of leadership on all political matters on the floor of the House, and by the same token the ranking member of that committee on the minority side is sometimes political floor leader on that side, though the distinction usually falls to the minority candidate for Speaker.

It must be understood that it is largely the game of politics that is being played in Congress. The exigencies of party advantage and the effort of each party to "put one over" on the other is the mainspring of a considerable per cent of the maneuvers made on the floor. It is on its chosen leader therefore that each side depends to a great extent for the watchfulness and tactics by which disaster is averted. But over and above this, the leader has a broader usefulness in his knowledge of parliamentary procedure and of the various measures brought before the House upon which his advice and guidance is sought. Frequently the leader recognizes lieutenants with special fitness along parliamentary lines or in legislative work.

For many years titular floor leadership was a heritage from membership on the all-powerful Committee on Rules, when it was composed of the Speaker and only four other Members. Then that committee was constituted of all leaders, each with his peculiar ability and standing in the House, and they were all parliamentarians of the first order. But since the enlargement of this committee, membership on it carries no such prestige as of old. Legislative leadership is that which relates to the conduct and control of a bill, and this leadership is assigned to the chairman or some majority member of the committee reporting it or having charge of it.

Leadership involved incessant work, and it was a marvel to many of Mr. MANN's colleagues how he stood the strain week in and week out, month after month. To see him in action on a busy day was a relaxation.

He has been called to his final rest and will be sadly missed in the places that knew him here. He was a naturalist and extremely fond of flowers and plants. At his home in Chicago he had a garden filled with them and found most of his recreation among them. If it were my privilege I would like to gather an armful of his favorite beauties and lay them across a tablet to be erected to his memory.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, of the high personal character and equally outstanding civic virtues of our late colleague, the Hon. JAMES ROBERT MANN, all his friends and associates, in fact, even those who only casually met him, can speak with total confidence. He was the personification of honor and candor in coversation and conduct. He practiced no guile or wile to accomplish his purposes. While he lacked neither shrewdness nor resourcefulness, he never stooped to deception or duplicity. He loved forensic combat and in parliamentary or legislative encounter neither asked nor gave quarter. He was a good lawyer, learned in the substance as well as in the practice of the law. He was a capable business man who grasped not only the fundamentals of private trade and industry, but mastered as well the much larger problems of administration of Government. With his keen, analytic intellect and constant application to broad principles as well as necessary details, he doubtless would have been a successful executive, but he preferred to devote almost the whole of his active career to legislative work. He was a lawmaker and a parliamentarian par excellence.

His conspicuous public services were in the council or aldermanic board of the city of Chicago and in the National House of Representatives. His services in the legislative body of the western metropolis were so important and valuable as to commend him readily to his neighbors and fellow citizens as meriting the higher honor of representing them in the National Legislature. Two men began their careers almost simultaneously in the city council of Chicago and both graduated from service in that body to membership here, where they have served with great distinction and benefit to the country. They were our late colleague, Mr. MANN and his neighbor and friend, the present Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN.

Older Members of the House can estimate and recite better than can the younger men the great services which Mr. MANN rendered the Republic in his capacity of legislator, but his great ability and effectiveness were patent to all. No bill came before the House, no measure was presented for action, no committee submitted a report, but Mr. MANN carefully studied the questions involved and prepared himself for informative debate and intelligent action. His industry was proverbial. If, as has been frequently stated, labor is the greater part of genius, our late colleague had not only the native endowment of an intuitive and spontaneous mind, but as well the acquired capability wrought by discipline, training, and application. His colleagues well know that the copy of a bill which he held in his hands during debate always contained marginal notes and pertinent clippings which marked the thoroughness and broad scope of his preparation on the measure. His speeches, at least in later years, were uniformly brief. He went directly to the point and there was no occasion for any extension of his remarks in the Congressional Record. Upon investigation I find that the Congressional Library contains indexed copies of several of his most notable longer addresses, among which are his speech on the war to free Cuba, delivered April 28, 1898, his speech on the proposed annexation of Hawaii, delivered June 11, 1898, his speech on the Porto Rico bill, delivered April 11, 1900, and his speech on the Nicaragua Canal, delivered May 2, 1900.

At this time it is not only interesting but instructive to recall some of our late colleague's utterances during his long and brilliant service in the House.

Note his impassioned plea for human rights in his speech on "The War to Free Cuba," in the discussion of the war revenue bill in the Committee of the Whole, when he said:

Mr. Chairman, the spirit of commercialism has been subordinated to the spirit of humanity. Patriotism is again supreme in our hearts. Greed and the love of gold yielded to the touch of sympathetic nature. No nobler offering to humanity, no greater sacrifice of self-interest, no loftier example of human kinship has ever been made. A mighty nation, wholly devoted to the arts of peace, absorbed in trade and gain, permeated with the desire for wealth and comforts, without a powerful Army and with only a moderate Navy, goes to war with a determined, cruel, and revengeful people because it dares to fight for the right and is determined to stop forever the despotic and cold-blooded cruelty to and robbery of the island of Cuba by the nation of Spain.

* * * * * * *

We do not fight for a fancied slight; we do not fight for a commercial wrong; we do not fight for an increase of territory; we do not fight because our commercial spirit has been outraged; we do not fight because our land has been invaded; we fight because it has become necessary to fight if we would uphold our manhood; because the leader of nations on our continent can not stand idly by while Spain is, with cold blood and cruelty, slaughtering and starving our next-door neighbors to death; because unless we are willing to fight we must abandon our vaunted pretentions of enlightened humanity and civilization; because we can not "pass by on the other side."

* * * * * * *

It has been said that war was terrible; that war is hell. Let it be so! War was terrible when the English Parliament levied a small tax upon tea imported to this land, but our forefathers fought for freedom. They were not afraid of war, nor are their descendants.

War was terrible in 1812, but the American people, few in number and small in wealth, were not then afraid of the mighty power of Great Britain.

War was terrible in 1845, but our people were not afraid to help the liberty-loving Texans, and my father was among those who then fought for his country and for freedom to another State on this continent.

War was terrible, war was hell, in 1861, but it did not frighten either those who wore the blue or the gray in behalf of what they believed to be right and freedom.

Has war grown so terrible that we now are afraid of it? Shall we muffle our ears and blind our eyes and pluck out our hearts to the piteous moanings and pleadings of the starving thousands in Cuba because we are afraid to spill our blood? Thank God, the American people have red blood instead of ice water running in their veins!

During the consideration in the House of the Joint Resolution to provide for the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands to the United States, Mr. MANN said on the broad question of national security:

Mr. Speaker, there never was a plainer proposition than the one for the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands. Politicians seeking for political advantage may endeavor to obscure it by sophistry and by special pleading. But the American people understand the situation. They know full well that it is an absolute necessity for the protection of our interests upon the great Pacific Ocean and for the protection of our own great Pacific shore line that the Hawaiian Islands should become part and parcel of the United States.

* * * * * * *

If I have read and studied aright the lessons of history, the battles for supremacy which in the past were fought out on the Ganges, on the Nile, in the Mediterranean, across the English Channel, on the Atlantic, will at some time in the future be fought across the Pacific Ocean. When that time comes, as come it will, the American flag will be protecting the Caucasian race, will be upholding the honor and dignity of the American people, will be furnishing security to our Pacific coast, will be providing support to our Pacific commerce, will be insuring the tranquility, the supremacy, and liberty of our people as it floats in grandeur over land and sea at the Hawaiian Islands.

In the consideration in Committee of the Whole of a bill for the construction of an isthmian canal, Mr. MANN reviewed the history of the various attempts to secure transportation across the Isthmus of Panama and in characteristic fashion urged action which would result in achievement. In the course of these remarks, he said:

Mr. Chairman, I favor an American canal, owned, controlled, fortified, and defended by the United States. Nature has given to our country certain natural advantages for our own defense which we ought not to destroy or in any way relinquish. * * *

Sir, you can appoint commissions until the heavens fall and the canal will remain unbuilt. What is required is action. The first thing toward the construction of the canal is to do something. The way to build the canal is to build it.

Other noteworthy publications, showing great diligence and thoroughness in preparation, are the reports which Mr. MANN submitted with various measures while he was chairman of the Committee on Elections No. 1 and of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Some of these are also preserved and listed in the Library of Congress.

As a parliamentarian Mr. MANN took not only high but leading rank. Had he been so disposed, his wide experience with and close analysis of parliamentary precedents could have produced a treatise which would have rivaled the manuals of our acknowledged authorities, Jefferson, Cushing, Robert, and others. It would be a task, well worth while, to cull out of the Congressional Record his observations on parliamentary questions and put them into accessible and permanent form. He frequently referred to precedents from memory, but his own reasoning was generally so cogent and direct that the precedents agreed with his view because he was right. He had the rare legal mind which determines legal principles primarily upon what must be the law and not upon what ambiguous language may seem to state the law to be. In the determination of parliamentary questions Mr. MANN was unmoved by prejudice or interest. He repelled temporary advantage by advocating action that might become a dangerous precedent. With consistent firmness he stood for rules and principles, "the effects of which," in the language of Thomas Jefferson, the father of American parliamentary law, "may be accuracy in business, economy of time, order, uniformity, and impartiality." Mr. MANN well knew, as all of us should realize, that even in the maintenance of orderly procedure, "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

When a grateful nation, by action of the Congress, returned the mortal remains of Representative MANN to the scene of his early struggles and successes, his neighbors and friends in Chicago and Illinois gathered at his bier, with the representatives of the National House and Senate, and attested their love and esteem for our late colleague. His memory will never fade in the city and State, which deemed it a high privilege to give his inestimable services to the Republic.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, once more the hand of death has been laid upon one of the most prominent and best loved members of this House. I know that every member of this House was, as I was, greatly shocked and grieved when we read in the morning paper that Hon. JAMES R. MANN had passed away, almost without warning and entirely unexpected by any of his colleagues, for it was not known that he was seriously ill, or in any immediate danger of death, although his health had been manifestly failing for many months. Those of us who have been long in the service here can not but note the frequency with which the flags on this Capitol are at half mast for the death of a member, who but a short time before has been active here in the performance of his official duties. But time passes and soon those same flags float again as high as ever. Truly death is no respecter of persons, the high and the low, the rich and the poor, the great as well as the ordinary mortal must pay the debt of nature which we all alike owe. And after that debt in any case is paid, the great world with all of its activities moves on in its course as before. Sometimes it almost seems that when a leader falls the business of the Nation must come to a stop; but it does not and it can not. Others fill the gap and the Nation and the world moves on as before. The plan of nature is like a resistless river that, regardless of obstructions, flows on forever.

I once heard a Democratic Member of Congress, himself one of the ablest men who ever occupied a seat in this House, say in debate that JIM MANN came very near being a great man. I think he came about as near to being entitled to that designation as any Member whom I have known in my term of service. I have no hesitation in saying that he was the most industrious, the best informed, and the greatest legislator I have ever known. And I have not the slightest doubt that his devotion to duty at all times was the means of materially shortening his life. His courage was dauntless, his honesty beyond question, and his sincerity always evident. Nothing on earth could swerve him from the line of duty as he saw it. It is quite a popular thing to criticise Members of Congress, sometimes no doubt justly, more often unjustly. It is too often charged that Members favor measures not in the interest of the people, or oppose measures which clearly are in the interest of the people at large. I do not think that such criticism is justified in one case of a thousand. I do think that one of the greatest faults with which Members can be charged is that they are altogether too anxious to do precisely what their constituents desire, whether for the best interests of the entire body of the people or not. It is hard to resist popular clamor. Mr. MANN had the courage to do that very thing and to stand at all times for what he believed to be right, regardless of consequences, and wholly indifferent to its effect upon himself personally.

It takes a really great man to do that, and therefore I say JIM MANN was in truth and in fact a great man. His services to the people of his district, his State, and the Nation were of inestimable value, and now that those services are ended his place in history is secure as one of the great characters who have served in this House with distinguished ability, and in the case of Mr. MANN, with devotion to the best interests of the people of the Nation, and with the love, esteem, and respect of all who have been privileged to serve with him here. I knew him well before he came to Congress, and I have been familiar with his record here during all the years of his service. I did not always agree with him, and in fact very radically disagreed with him in some things and on many occasions, but any such disagreement did not in the least affect our friendship, which continued uninterruptedly through all the years. In debate he was a "biting man from bitter creek," but personally and at heart he was as kindly and gentlemanly a character as I have ever known. His place in this House as a Representative of the people was one that it will not be an easy matter to fill, and he will be missed as few others of his colleagues would be. We who believe that this life is not all; that what we call death will not end all, confidently hope and believe that the usefulness of a great character will be renewed in another sphere, and that there some day, some time, somewhere we shall meet again and there renew the friendships formed here on earth.

For love will hope, and faith will trust
That somehow, somewhere, meet we must.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker—

Now is the stately column broke,
The beacon's light is quenched in smoke,
The trumpet's silver voice is still,
The warder silent on the distant hill.

As quickly as a meteor flashes through the skies, the foremost figure in this Congress of the United States has left us for a greater Congress of all nations, climes, and peoples. Unfortunately, the Republic will never fully realize that it has thus lost its most faithful, most useful, most efficient, most valuable, and, in this Congress, the most influential of all its distinguished public servants. As one recalls how much larger he loomed on the floor of this House than in the eye of the general public who read only the newspapers, the fact is almost inconceivable to those of us who have served with him for a few years. A distinguished Democrat once said to me that the country could well afford to pay JIM MANN a million dollars a year for his services here, and it was simple truth.

When I first came to Congress I had been somewhat prejudiced by silly newspaper talk. From Chicago I came with a young Democrat who was clerk of some committee here and was a bitter critic and enemy of Congressman MANN, for reasons which he freely gave. Finally I said to him, "If all this is true, why is it that Mr. MANN has so long been the practically absolute leader of his party?" He said, "I guess it was because of his ability and integrity," which seemed to me to be reason enough, and which fact determined my future attitude toward him.

Those who have served in this House at any time during the last quarter of a century will keep in their minds as long as they live the Hon. JAMES R. MANN, of Illinois, the author of the white slave act and the proponent of the woman's suffrage amendment to the Constitution, the two greatest legislative achievements that have ever gone into law for the female race, to whom he was the greatest friend and for whom he was the greatest leader in all the history of mankind. In all the time he was in this House no other legislation has been so important as to surpass these in actual service to the human race, and they alone would be sufficient to announce to the world that one of its greatest statesmen passed away when this stately column broke.

For almost a generation that great leader stood on this floor in peace and in war and in rumors of war, in toil and strife and defeat and victory, and that brilliant mind and mighty soul was never swept away by success and never succumbed to defeat. His steady figure towered above them all. For years he was the leader of a minority and fought their battles with a zest and a zeal and a skill, with an ability and courage, with a knowledge of every phase of parliamentary contest that stamped him as the greatest master of legislation on this floor who ever sat in the Congress of the United States. No attack ever found him unprepared. No victorious assault ever took the flag of his party away from his mighty hand; and when his party passed into victory and the final laurels for which he hoped did not crown his ambition, he never faltered in his stride for an instant, but accepted his defeat with a smile, as Mr. Great Heart only could, and that very night achieved for his party perhaps the greatest tactical and parliamentary victory ever accomplished when he after an all-night fight unseated a Democrat and seated a Republican in a Democratic House after as desperate a struggle as was ever had on this floor, when after an all-night contest, as the first rays of the morning sun glistened along the Atlantic, he challenged the Speaker's ruling and succeeded in overruling the decision of Mr. Speaker Clark, almost President of the United States, in a Democratic House, and so seated a Republican by one majority. No man in American history but JAMES R. MANN could have accomplished that; and no feature of his great career more won him the respect and esteem of his colleagues than the greatness of soul he showed when he, after years of leadership, was denied the reward of his ambitions and loyally continued that fight for his party.

In his long career here he never feared to vote as he thought was just, or to take issue with the House if he thought he was right, as we all saw when he voted to seat Victor Berger of Wisconsin, though only two others joined with him in that vote; but a practically unanimous House conceded he did this because he thought it was right, and no criticism was ever made of an act which might easily have lost him the respect of many of his associates.

In all the years when the Government wealth was often at his disposal, his integrity remained spotless, when he might have accumulated millions. He never hesitated to cast a vote that might easily have brought him the condemnation of the people he served. He never hesitated to do his duty, whether his services were rewarded or not.

All those who are here remember when every day we expected to hear from the hospital in Baltimore that he had passed away. Suddenly the whispered word told us that Mr. MANN at the risk of his life had come here to vote for the woman's suffrage amendment. He was—

> A soul supreme in each hard instance tried,
> Above all pain, all passion and all pride,
> The rage of power, the blast of public breath,
> The lust of lucre and the dread of death.

Probably no other member of either branch of Congress has given more consideration and attention and service to all legislation than this man. No public duty was so insignificant, so arduous, so undistinguished, that it did not receive the attention of this greatest of all parliamentary leaders and legislators. He threw into the smallest task the same ability and care he did into the great bills on which men make a reputation. He saved this country millions of dollars. While he accomplished the very highest possibilities of great statesmen, he gave the same loving care to the most minute details of a Congressman's duty from which no fame or repute could be derived.

With an eye single to the taxpayer's service, he followed every dollar to its ultimate accomplishment for the benefit of the taxpayers, and contemporaneously he wrote his name among the stars of American statesmanship by his greatest legislative deeds. The American women should some day build here in the Capital a monument to the man who did most for them of all those who have been here, and should see that his name goes into the hall of fame to shine forever, and prove their appreciation of what is done for their sex.

While he was equal to every duty, however large, while he neglected no work, however small, it is probable that JIM MANN took his greatest pleasure in the combats of this floor, where he was the past master of the art of parliamentary leadership, and he will be best remembered, as he would like to be, I expect, as the most gallant, most determined, and best equipped of all those who have fought and lost and won, first and foremost in the strife of public life here, where he never faltered in the thickest of the fight, where he never failed in the hour when advice was needed, and where he will never be replaced by his equal as a parliamentary leader during the life of any man who served with him.

Mr. MANN was preeminently the parliamentary chieftain, without fear and without reproach, shrewd and wise in preparation, crafty in ambush, bold and vigorous in attack, proud in defiance, and lofty in achievement.

> Fleet foot on the correi,
> Sage counsel in cumber,
> Red hand in the foray,
> How sound is thy slumber!

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have it understood that the theme or thought that I am about to adhere to is this: JAMES R. MANN, servant of THE PEOPLE. He was no man's servant, except as he was the servant of the people.

It is hard to avoid wandering or departing somewhat from this theme, because he was such a many-sided individual, lawyer and law student, attorney and counselor, legislator and parliamentarian, office worker and floor worker, committee member and committee commander; at home in biography and history, and in libraries in books; graduate of Illinois' great university 47 years ago, master of laws in 1892 and doctor of laws of the same as long ago as 1903; member of the Oakland School Board as early as 1887; attorney for Hyde Park for years from 1888; alderman from the ward of Chicago made out of Hyde Park from 1893 to 1897, when he came to this House, 26 years ago; student of education, of science, of art, of finance, of municipal government, of diplomacy; capable of being governor, Senator, ambassador, or President; digger and delver in all branches of knowledge and progress. What a worker and what a work!

Yet he laid aside all distractions and delights to be the servant of the people—the whole people—with no man his master, no man who could say to him, "Do this" or "Do that," with no man who dared to say it.

Mr. MADDEN'S emphatic and forceful address—a real oration—was preceded by Mr. MANN.

Just as we had all been surprised into admiration by the address of Mr. MADDEN; so we were, by the address of Mr. MANN.

It was not so energetic or emphatic as Mr. MADDEN'S.

But it was a complete discourse, a treatise, a history, and a textbook, a lecture.

National currency and finance through all time—the 6,000 years of human history—were skillfully sketched and summarized. Quotations from master minds of the money question from all climes were marshalled. It was argument unanswerable.

We all went home that night with gratitude to the speakers and with thanks in our hearts to Providence that the ranks of the public men of Illinois contained two such students and champions; that Illinois, and through it the Nation, had in its service and at its command two such voices and physiques, two such intelligent fighters.

The following year Mr. MADDEN escaped election to the United States Senate by 1 or 2 votes, and in after years both were again and again advocated and urged to be candidates, but fortunately both have remained here to ornament and adorn, to embellish and enrich this House of Commons of the American people.

I get the words "no man's servant, except as he was the servant of the people," from his own careful language. I heard him say here one day, "I use language carefully." He was not talking about himself, he was talking, in a speech of four minutes, about our colleague, William E. Mason, who had passed away. It was the 26th of February last year. Here are, in part, the things he said about Mr. Mason:

Mr. Speaker, we called him Billy Mason because we loved him.
The people called him Billy Mason because they loved him.
He appealed to the people.
He never endeavored to build up a personal political organization.
He appealed to the minds, to the reason, to the hearts of the people.

He continued:

* * * * * * *

Mr. Mason's great aim in life was to help somebody who needed help.
It was not confined to those in distress abroad.
But everywhere, anywhere, his heart throbbed and thrilled with emotion, for the distressed and oppressed in any clime and in any land.

He continued:

We shall miss him, we do miss him, from the halls of the House.
He was no man's servant, except as he was the servant of the people.
He did what he thought was right, and he had the courage of his convictions.

He finished thus:

Mr. Mason's family relations were so touching, so loving, that I hesitate to enter that sacred place, but his widow and his children will always know that he occupied the highest place in the esteem and in the love of all Members of this House.

Mr. Speaker, these utterances by Mr. MANN inform us and advise us. They reveal to us his capacity and facility of expression of sentiment and emotion. How tender and touching and gentle was all this!

And when he used the words:

He was no man's servant, except as he was the servant of the people

How well he knew what a true servant of the people is! How well he described himself!

I first saw and heard JAMES R. MANN'S voice in 1896.

There was a great political rally.

It was at Jacksonville, county seat of Morgan County, Ill.

It was late in the campaign; about the last day of October.

It was an opera-house meeting.

There was a crowded house.

Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN was the first speaker, as I recall it.

His address, of course, was full of emphasis, accuracy, conciseness, and business astuteness, and, above all, earnestness and sincerity.

We had a rare treat that night.

We had been told that two Chicago aldermen were to speak.

About all we expected to hear, I think, was some discussion of the bribery, bulldozing, and ballot-box stuffing supposed to surround Chicago.

This was because the Chicago press, posing as great moral agencies, attacked all public officials, almost without exception, and almost all the time, but had not attacked these two men.

We did not imagine the State campaign committee would send us boodlers or bulldozers.

But we wondered what two Chicago aldermen knew about "primary money," and "secondary money," and "redemption money," and "Coin's Financial School," and "the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold, at the ratio of 16 to 1, without the aid or consent of any other nation." We were agreeably disappointed.

Mr. MANN believed in God. He believed that men go to Heaven. Concerning Hon. Champ Clark, he said:

He has gone, but his memory will linger long in the Halls of this House, influencing those who are here and those who come afterwards to remember that contests over principles do not need to degenerate into personal animosities. He was the exemplification of the American spirit to contest for principles and to abide peacefully by the results.

I have not read, in any memorial address, words more tenderly touching and more notably eloquent than those with which our colleague the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana, the Hon. HENRY GARLAND DUPRÉ, on the 29th day of February, 1920, brought to a close his tribute to a departed member, long his colleague.

I take the liberty because of my poverty of words to quote and reproduce, as applying to Mr. MANN, those gentle yet challenging paragraphs, the grace and graciousness of which so impressed me at the time, that I have not been able to forget them.

They read as follows:

Until his last gasp, he fought sham, hypocrisy, duplicity, double-dealing of every sort, private and public. Is it too much to hope that after such service in the church militant, a risen Christ, in whom he always believed, granted him fellowship in the church triumphant? So believing I say to this knightly gentleman, this loyal citizen, this faithful friend, this devoted, tender and affectionate husband, "Ave atque vale"—"Hail and farewell."

The Speaker resumed the chair.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, my associations with JAMES R. MANN were such as to make it difficult for me to speak of him and his work in the House with cold judgment. He was my friend—my friend in sunshine and in the stress of storm—and he never wavered in his loyalty to his friends. So, I may be prejudiced in my judgment; but I believe the majority of men who served with him will agree with me when I express the opinion that he was the most industrious, the most courageous, and the most efficient legislator who has been in Congress in many years.

Mr. MANN did not come to Congress unprepared for the work of a legislator. He began his legal profession as the attorney for the village of Hyde Park, then the largest village in the United States, and now a large part of the city of Chicago. There he studied the needs of village government, and the village is the beginning of government, where the foundation of all government is laid. He was later a member of the Board of Education and the South Park Board and a member of the City Council of Chicago. In all these positions he studied government in its various applications to the needs of the people in village, city, and county, laws for the protection, education, and healthy amusement of the people; the assessment of taxes, and the expenditure of public money for the benefit of the people who paid the taxes.

He was, therefore, trained for the larger work he had to assume when he came to the House, and I never knew a new Member to take up the work here with more intelligence, more energy, and better judgment. He did not at once aspire to leadership, but accepted assignment to committee service as it came to him and studied the questions that came before his committee until he was advanced to that great Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce at a time when it was the center of legislation that touched every interest in the country. There the industry and intelligent application of his study and experience gave him leadership through the recognition of Members on both sides of the House, and also by the Senate, the President, and the country.

More than any other one man he ironed out the controversies over the Hepburn railroad bill, and he took the pure food bill, which had passed the Senate without careful consideration, and made it an effective pure food law. In that work there was a call for not only conscientious and painstaking effort, but also for more than ordinary courage because the country had been excited by clever propaganda until the President was insistent that the House should accept the Senate bill. Many Members of the House became affected with hysteria, as petitions and demands poured in on them and the newspapers assailed the Speaker, the Committee on Rules, and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for delay in enacting that legislation.

But JAMES R. MANN, who had charge of the bill, did not get excited. He kept cool and worked day and night until he was satisfied that the proposed legislation would effectively protect the food of the American people, and when he reported his bill to the House and explained the changes he had made, the House by a large majority accepted his work and passed the bill as it came from the committee. The Senate also accepted the House bill and so did the President with the enthusiastic indorsement that it was a great improvement over the bill he had advocated. The pure food law was the work of JAMES R. MANN.

That was one of the greatest triumphs of individual judgment, based on careful investigation, I have ever seen in the Congress of the United States in my long service here. It was a fine testimonial to Mr. MANN nearly a score of years ago, and the beginning of his safe and sane and courageous leadership and his recognition as an undisputed parliamentary authority by both sides of the House. I know of no more enduring monument to a legislator than that which the membership of the House, whether controlled by one party or the other, has builded to the memory of my late friend and colleague, JAMES R. MANN.

Mr. SPROUL. Mr. Speaker, having listened to the splendid orations given here to-day in memory of our departed colleague, Hon. JAMES R. MANN, I feel at a loss to know what to add to that which has already been said. Surely no further words are necessary to impress upon my hearers the sorrow and bereavement felt so keenly by this entire House, nor the irreparable loss we, his colleagues, have suffered in having been bereft of an able leader and a faithful friend. Nor can I expect to portray more vividly than has been done those attributes which won him the respect and the homage due to him as a statesman, an orator, and a tireless worker for the right in all matters of legislation with which he had to do.

But, Mr. Speaker, I can perhaps express to you and to my colleagues a more personal and intimate feeling toward the friend who has gone, for out of the fullness of my heart I speak of my early acquaintance with Mr. MANN, more than 40 years ago, when he was, even at that early age, a leader among his fellow men and those associated with him in the government of our city and State. Men looked to him then, as in later years, for guidance and encouragement, always sure of receiving the best that he had to give.

Speaking as I do, from my experience in those early associations with Mr. MANN, I can truthfully and thankfully say that he was my never-failing inspiration, and so, in these later years of our service together in this assembly, years all too short, I found him still the exponent of those sound principles of justice and right upon which he had laid the foundation of his career, and willing, as always, to cheerfully give of himself and his time to promote those ideals which he had instilled into the minds and hearts of his hearers of other days.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all who may desire may extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all who may desire may extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE MOSES P. KINKAID, OF NEBRASKA.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the additional order of the day.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska, by unanimous consent—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS] will please take the chair.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I realize fully well my inability to paint a word picture that will even faintly reflect the love, respect, and esteem in which the people of the Sixth Congressional District of Nebraska held the friendship and labor of the late Judge MOSES P. KINKAID. Even so, I bring this tribute to the shrine of his memory that the people he served so long and faithfully as their representative in Congress may have the solace of knowing that in his death his work, his activities, and his accomplishments have not been forgotten.

Judge KINKAID was born January 24, 1850, in the State of Virginia. His childhood and early boyhood were spent near the line that separates what is now West Virginia from Pennsylvania. His parents lived in Virginia, his grandparents in Pennsylvania. He had a vivid recollection of, and frequently referred to, the days just before the beginning of the Civil War, as well as the actual hostilities of contending armies in and about his boyhood home. In his reminiscent moods he frequently told of slave-running days, and how he, a boy, without comprehending the significance of the act, had piloted fugitive slaves coming from somewhere in the South and headed for Canada, to his grandparents' home in Pennsylvania, where food, shelter, and aid were afforded them. And after reciting such incidents in his life he would add:

When I came to understand it, it made me constitutionally an abolitionist.

The war closed. Just before and during the war period young KINKAID had finished his studies at the common schools. Ambitious for an education, and thrilled by the stormy war scenes he had witnessed, though not participated in, he entered college in Greene County, Pa. After a time, how long I do not know, his parents died, and, quitting college, he turned his face to the West.

Selecting the law as his chosen profession, he registered as a student at Ann Arbor, Mich., where he finished the law course and was admitted to practice in the year 1876. His studious habits, his keen analytical mind, and his gentlemanly bearing attracted the attention of the faculty and student body at this institution of learning and he was elected president of his class during his senior year, an honor he deeply appreciated and frequently alluded to when talking of the school day period that is a part of every man's life.

From Ann Arbor he went to Henry County, Ill., fully equipped to enter the practice of the law. He had a quick, accurate legal mind, and was soon emersed in the litigation of the community. For a short time he conducted an office in Illinois, when the lure of the West again possessed him, and he quit an established practice to try new fields of endeavor.

The West at that time was going through a series of rapid evolutions. I think I might say, convulsions, and be well within the limits of the facts. West of the Missouri River it was an untried country. In the seventies the Union Pacific Railroad stretched across the plains in its reach for the Golden Gate. The Northwestern and Burlington had out scouting and surveying parties, examining, trying, testing, an undeveloped country, and on whose report the railroad builders of the West would move. And into the turmoil and strife that such conditions produce we next find M. P. KINKAID, lawyer.

I was fortunate in forming an acquaintance with Judge KINKAID in 1887, an acquaintance that ripened into a warm personal friendship. And as I have studied the characteristics of his life and the psychology of his environment I have wondered how and why a man of his quiet, gentle, uncombative nature should throw in with the men who, at that time, were the rugged, quick, impulsive characters who were driving the black line of the desert before them in a strenuous effort to subdue a wilderness and change it from a cow country into an agricultural garden. But he did. He became a part of the frontier and a participant in its life and manners. He saw the country in its making and aided in its development. And his influence was always for good; his voice and his efforts for law and order.

Leaving Illinois, Judge KINKAID first located at Pierre, Dakota Territory. The railroad was pushing its nose into the West. He stopped at Sioux Falls to get his bearings. From there he went to Yankton. A stretch of some 250 miles had to be made from Yankton to Pierre. This he made by wagon train, taking a working law library with him. He announced, when he opened his law office at Pierre, that it would some day become the capital of a State, and he never lost faith in this belief. While he was a resident of Pierre he was lawyer and banker for the community. The wild life of those "vigilante" days were vividly penciled in his memory. The trail leading west to the Black Hills country was crowded with prospectors and the class of men that a gold field always draws to it. Pierre became the headquarters for outfitting and supplies, and consequently drew to it all the various characters and elements that such a life affords. Of this wild and turbulent life of the West he was a witness but hardly a part. He spent the greater part of three years at Pierre, when transportation facilities changed the course of his life. He was remote from railroad connections. Then the Northwestern Railroad, headed from Omaha to the Black Hills country, built into O'Neill, Nebr. In order to get into closer touch with the outside world, he disposed of his banking enterprise and moved his law office to O'Neill, in the fall of 1881, where he resided until death called him, July 6, 1922.

About the same rough, rugged, ready, and uncouth citizenship that has always marked the building of a railroad into unsettled territory greeted him at his new location. And again I wonder why a man of his gentle and retiring nature mingled from choice with the men on an untamed frontier. In the broadness and deepness of a new country, he elected to become a pioneer and bring to that country the standard of civilization, high morals, and personal fellowship that characterized his whole life. He brought to it more. He brought to it law and order, respect for individual rights, regard for society, and a desire for a religious life. Of all of these he was a sponsor and a part. It took courage to do this. Courage not of the kind displayed at San Mihiel or in the Argonne Woods, but moral courage; courage of that high type that scorns ridicule, that defies gross censure. And out of it all came the KINKAID that we knew.

An incident indicative of the life he led in this new and rapidly developing country occurred last April. While at Pierre he was instrumental in organizing a Congregational church. He prepared the articles for the organization, incorporating it under the canon law of the church. The congregation built a new church at Pierre, and dedicated it last spring. The pastor in charge, looking over the old records of the church, uncovered the roll of the first membership. He wrote Judge KINKAID a letter, asking him to be present at, and participate in, the dedication services of the new church. The incident pleased the Judge greatly. And while he could not attend in person he wrote the pastor a letter, setting forth the early activities of the church, and his humble effort to encourage a respect for a religious life and establish a desire for the observance of religious customs in the open country of the West.

It is a great privilege to be one of the first in the settlement and development of a great country; to be a pioneer in its activities; to see the black line of the desert roll back; to see the country unfold and give up its treasures, its fruits, its grains, its products, to the efforts of the husbandman; to watch a country reclaimed, pass from the stage of frontier life and take on the habiliments of civilization. All this passed in panorama before Judge KINKAID. With the advent of the railroad, villages and towns sprung up. Churches were built and schoolhouses dotted the plains. Judge KINKAID'S entry into public life followed. It was natural that the men of such a reclaimed country should honor the strong man, the outstanding and directing character who leads and shows them the way to success.

The State senatorial district in which he lived was composed of five counties and the unorganized territory west of Holt, his home county. This "unorganized territory" was a stretch of country 60 miles wide and extending west to the Wyoming line, a distance of 288 miles. One line of railroad, the Northwestern, was building west through this district. A fight was on between conflicting interests in this new territory, just opening to settlement under the homestead laws. It was in the old days of the convention system of making nominations for public office. Delegates had to be elected and their attendance at the convention provided for. M. P. KINKAID, the lawyer, driving a pair of bronchos to a top buggy, made a canvass of this senatorial district in the interests of the homestead element. When the convention convened he was nominated. At the general election in 1882 he was elected and became the chairman of the judiciary committee of the senatorial body. The roster of the senate, appearing in the session laws for 1883, shows the following:

M. P. KINKAID, lawyer; O'Neill; born in Virginia; single; aged 32; Republican.

When the legislature adjourned, he returned to his office at O'Neill and resumed the practice of the law. In 1884, and again in 1886, he declined to be a candidate for further legislative honors, although importuned by his friends to allow the use of his name in the political canvasses that followed.

In the meantime a population, gathered from all the Mississippi Valley States, was pouring through O'Neill into the counties organized from his old senatorial district. The legislature of 1887 found it necessary to redistrict the State into judicial districts to properly care for the growing interests of the new counties which were being rapidly populated. Judge KINKAID'S home county, Holt, with the counties west of it to the Wyoming line, was organized into the ninth judicial district. No resident judge lived in this newly organized district. Judge KINKAID was appointed judge of the new district and assumed the duties of the office April 1, 1887. He was the first judge to hold court in the district, in extent 60 miles north and south and 288 miles east and west. Later this territory was served by two judges. But for five years Judge KINKAID was the sole presiding judge. He held court once each year in each county, and in some of them much oftener. The counties not reached by railroad he made by stage.

I wish I could make you comprehend the magnitude of his work, see the people who appeared before his court, and understand the problems that came before him for solution.

As a judge his work was not wholly judicial. He must bring to this newly organized district not only the law but a respect for it, and a willingness to abide by its dicta. No man could have performed this duty to society more successfully. The man charged with the commission of a crime—and there were many capital offenses on his trial docket—as well as the man who had suffered for the offense of another was made to feel that the protecting arm of the law was about him, and that in the court over which Judge KINKAID presided each would receive a square deal under the law, and justice would be done. By such methods, in the rugged life of the frontier, he brought respect for the administration of the law to the citizen, and with it a decent respect for order under the established customs of the law. People soon came to have faith in him, confidence in the justness of his administration, and esteemed him for the fairness of his judicial decisions.

For thirteen years he made this territory, holding court, hearing controversies, settling disputes, counseling public officials as to their duties, and giving advice from the bench to audiences assembled in the courtroom which in his judgment was wholesome and wise and for the best interests of the community he served. By such methods he built up friendships among the honest, industrious, virile men of his district, strong as steel bands and as enduring as granite. He possessed a wonderful knowledge of human nature, an accurate standard for measuring and understanding men.

At the end of his third term as judge he voluntarily retired from the bench, leaving a record for efficiency, measured by reversals, equaled by but few men who have served three full terms on the bench. He again resumed his practice at O'Neill.

Judge KINKAID'S entry into Congress as the representative of the Sixth Congressional District of Nebraska was the natural sequence of a long and popular service on the district bench. He was first nominated in 1900 without opposition. The district, from its organization, had been anti-Republican, and at the general election following he was defeated.

At the convention in 1902 he was again nominated. But at this convention six strong men from the district contended for the nomination. Judge KINKAID was nominated on the 768th ballot. He was elected the following November. Since that election, covering now a period of 20 years, he has been nominated without opposition, and has received the support of the people of the district almost without regard to political lines. The great faith the people had in him as their judge remained with him as their Representative in Congress. He was their fellow worker, their servant. His great heart was in the work he was doing for the people of the West. His first effort as a Member of the House was for the passage of the homestead law, known as the Kinkaid Act. Under its provisions practically all the public domain available for homestead purposes has been entered and homes established thereon. His next effort was directed toward the reclamation of the semiarid lands of the West by irrigation. And while in the beginning this development was local in character, it has now assumed a national importance. Presiding over the House committee that directs this great work the marked success of this arm of Government service was a great satisfaction to him. His efforts wherever put forth were in the interests of the home and the home builder. The success of the individual working to make for himself and his family a home on a Government homestead selected from the public domain was the first concern of his official life. The last concern of his eventful career was to bring to the man striving against the elements of nature to build up a home on a Government irrigation unit the means, the aid, and assistance that would carry the hope for success.

Of him I think it may be truly written, as of Abou of old:

I pray thee, then, write me as one who loves his fellow men.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, we are here to-day to pay our tribute to the memory of our late colleague, MOSES P. KINKAID. Over a quarter of a century have I known him as citizen, district judge, and national legislator. Earlier he had served his State in its law-making body. To each of these positions he had brought earnest effort, intelligent conception, and unquestioned integrity. He was the Hamilton of the sixth congressional district of Nebraska, large in extent as some States. He gave to its needs careful thought and crystallized his conclusions into enactments which have made the former weaknesses of that district its strength. He was instrumental in turning lonely sandhills into homes of happy ranchers and barren wastes into irrigated gardens. Although his district was greater in extent than several States and had a population greater than any other in his State, to no constituent did he ever turn a deaf ear. All appeals received prompt attention and response. No matter was too trivial for careful attention. So he kept in close touch with his people and became to all "Uncle Mose," and such indeed he was. Upon the floor of the House he did not seek to be a leader or an orator, yet he invariably took care of the interest of his district and matters committed to him or his committee. He had by a consistent and honorable course so won the confidence of his fellow members that he was rarely if ever refused that which he sought. He left to others the speaking part and sought by service to secure the results that were best for his district, his State, and his country. When the roll of those who wrought well in the development of the Great Northwest is made up, high on that roll will be the name of MOSES P. KINKAID.

He was tender hearted as a mother, and if he had a weakness it was that he feared to cause pain even to those who merited the chastening rod. May we all live to leave as few wounds as he.

Mr. THORPE. Mr. Speaker, it was not my good fortune to serve in Congress with MOSES P. KINKAID, whose memory we have assembled here to honor to-day. I can not, therefore, speak of his service in this House as my distinguished colleagues have spoken. But it is my purpose to say a few words here, which I am sure will meet the unanimous approval of the great citizenship of that great northwestern domain of our country which he so ably represented for so many years. MOSES P. KINKAID, through his untiring work and implicit faith, combined with his knowledge of the needs of humanity, lit the torch of civilization on more square miles of territory than any man in the last 50 to 100 years, and in hundreds and thousands of homes in Nebraska, Kansas, South Dakota, Montana, North Dakota, Idaho, Utah, Wyoming, Arizona, and New Mexico, his name will always be remembered as the father of the Kinkaid Act.

Through this act millions of acres of land went under cultivation, happy homes were established, and cities were builded, and the Indian and the buffalo gave up their centuries-old abiding place to the onrushing hordes of humanity seeking homes in the new land of promise and opportunity. MOSES P. KINKAID was a pioneer in every sense that the word implies; he devoted his life to the country that he loved; he was a builder not only of homes and cities, but a builder of character and a better citizenship; he spent his early life among the people of his chosen adoption and the people who loved him. Every plainsman and pioneer knew him and looked upon him as their friend, and when the time came for them to have a chance to show their appreciation of his efforts in their behalf all political lines were broken and all religious creeds forgotten, and Republicans and Democrats, Protestants and Catholics alike, helped to make each one of his many victories more decisive. For more than a third of a century he served his State and the Nation, and in all these years not one word of reproach was ever cast against his name, and he went down to his last resting place remembered and loved by all who knew him.

It was my good fortune to know scores of his most intimate friends in northwestern Nebraska, who had known him from the first day that he set foot on the soil of the State which honors him to-day. It was a pleasure on many occasions to hear them relate the story of the early days, in which he was such a leading and important factor, and the history of the great Northwest would be incomplete without referring to this noble man who was one of its greatest benefactors. As a Member of Congress his history is indelibly written, so that time itself will never be able to erace his name from its pages.

Court records for years, and perhaps centuries, will refer to the act which he fathered. Learned lawyers and judges will cite this important piece of legislation to courts and juries far down the avenue of time, and so it may be truly said of this good and faithful servant:

He left his footprints on the sands of time.

The history of Nebraska could not be written without the life of MOSES P. KINKAID. He stands without a parallel in the development of its great resources. Its citizens will ever remember and refer to the good service he rendered through the many years he gave in the various positions of trust that he was honored with.

He died in the harness, with his last days devoted to the cause of good government and a better citizenship. The Nation mourned at his departure, Nebraska wept at the loss of a true and faithful servant, high officials of the State and Nation mingled with the plainsman and the pioneer, to pay their last respects, when his mortal remains were brought by many sad hearts to his home city, on the last journey which finished his earthly career. He was consigned by loving hands to the mother earth that he helped to reclaim from the Indian and the buffalo, there to await the judgment day, and though no pretentious tomb of marble or granite may ever mark his resting place, his memory is forever enscrolled in the history of the Great Northwest; yes, MOSES P. KINKAID is gone. The last page of his history is written. The chapter is ended.

He sleeps—

Out where the hand clasps a little stronger,
Out where the smile dwells a little longer,
That's where the West begins.
Out where the sun is a little brighter,
Where the snows that fall are a trifle whiter,
Where the bonds of home are a wee bit tighter,
That's where the West begins.

He sleeps—

Out where the skies are a trifle bluer,
Out where the friendship's a little truer,
That's where the West begins,
Out where a fresher breeze is blowing,
Where there's laughter in every streamlet flowing,
Where there's more of reaping and less of sowing,
That's where the West begins.

He sleeps—

Out where the world is in the making,
Where fewer hearts in despair are aching,
That's where the West begins;
Where there's more of singing and less of sighing,
Where there's more of giving and less of buying,
And a man makes friends without half trying,
In Nebraska; that's where the West begins.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I came here to-day to join with the Members of the House of Representatives in expressing their grief and sorrow at the loss of the splendid Members in whose memory these exercises are held. I expected to express that sorrow by my presence. I did not expect to speak. I came to listen. As one of the speakers to-day was closing his splendidly appropriate address in a voice wet with tears and choking with emotion and heartsobs at the thought that while the parting was not for all eternity, it was an everlasting good-by as far as this earth is concerned, it occurred to me that we are not here so much to mourn as to express our admiration for the grand American lives that were led by those in whose memory we have met here, and by expressing our appreciation of the great work done by these splendid Americans, carry to those who will read of these exercises our admiration for these men and thereby stimulate the youth of our land to emulate their virtues and endeavor to follow the splendid careers of the great legislators who have gone to that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler has ever returned.

It is not a new idea but it is nevertheless a grandly inspiring one that logically there must be beyond this sphere of action a higher and nobler arena where men who have been trained to meet the great problems of the day on this earth and who have solved them will in all probability be accorded a higher and nobler theater in which to solve greater problems, and in that more exalted sphere of action to which they have been transferred, respond bravely to the call of duty, even as they did here. Not by lamentations and mournful chants, therefore, ought we to commemorate the virtues of a good man, but by hymns, for in ceasing to be numbered with mortals he enters upon the heritage of a larger, grander, nobler life. Of course it is as natural to die as to be born; but death does not mean the tongueless silence of the dreamless dust, it merely marks the beginning of the waterfowl's journey through space from the wintry blast to the land of everlasting eternal summer.

Death stamps the character and conditions of men for eternity and determines what position and in what theater they will act in the next world. As death finds them here in this world, will the new life find them there just as soon as the spirit takes wings for the other shore.

It is a fine idea to hold memorial services not only to express the grief which we can not restrain, but to a larger extent for the purpose of giving the youth of the country, the boys and girls, our admiration for those who have done noble things, not dreamed them all day long, and so made life and death and that vast forever one grand sweet song. So to-day we express our admiration for those splendid, heroic figures who, unmindful of the temptations to secure vast possessions and the lure of great wealth, devoted their lives to the service of their country in the legislative halls of this land, who gave freely and unstintedly of their talents, remaining poor while they served here, in order that this Republic might continue to survive and be a Government of the people, for the people, by the people. It is a grandly inspirational idea which has been well expressed in the splendid words that have been spoken in memoriam, of the two greatest legislators who have gone to their reward, that in that higher sphere of action to which they have been called they are either near the Great White Throne or in some great field of duty assigned by the Almighty, are carrying out His will in accordance with a great universal divine plan.

I knew Judge KINKEAD, as I was wont affectionately to call him, for from the day I first came here he appealed powerfully to my imagination. I knew not why, but I know it to-day. It little occurred to me that that quiet, gentlemanly, almost subdued figure that sauntered from the Office Building over to this Capitol could have beneath his breast the wild and fiery spirit that participated in the winning of the West and saw in that great theater the performances that he wished to see on this earth—the subjugation of the wilderness by civilization. During the strolls that I took with him he used to express his love and admiration for what he considered the great literature of our language, and on one occasion—I never will forget it—he stopped and told me how much he loved the philosophical contemplations contained in the immortal Thanatopsis. As a youth I used to recite those lines which well express that which is away deep down in our own thoughts and souls, and I am going to recall them, because I am sure that Judge KINKEAD lives in some scene beyond this, but is able to listen and is listening to the voices of his living friends. If it were otherwise it would be the most illogical construction that could be devised by man, let alone by Almighty God.

If silentium—nothing but eternal silence after the grave—then indeed can the human race sigh with Omar—

Oh Love could you and I with Him conspire
To grasp this sorry scheme of things entire,
Would we not shatter it to bits
And then remould it nearer to the heart's desire?

I am sure Judge KINKAID is listening, and I know it will please him to hear the lines that gave earthly fame and worldly glory to William Cullen Bryant.

I will recite them, but will omit them from the RECORD, for they are the spiritual life of our country, beautifully, religiously, sacredly, profoundly expressed, and are, or should be, known to every American man and woman and to every boy and girl of America.

Another word and I am done, for with that requiem all is said that can be said. And God said, "Let there be light, and there was light," needs no elaboration.

Judge KINKAID was a righteous man. And it matters not at what hour the righteous fall asleep. Death can not come untimely to him who is fit to die. The less of this cold world, the more of heaven; the briefer life, the earlier immortality.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, the long-established custom followed in the House of meeting here to honor the memory of departed Members seems to me a sacred one. It is with this feeling that I avail myself of the opportunity to lay my modest tribute before the bier of our late colleague, MOSES P. KINKAID. My association with Judge KINKAID in our public duties was quite intimate during my 10 years' service in this House. We served together through several sessions on the Committee on Arid Lands, of which he was chairman, and in the consideration of reclamation legislation, in which we were both deeply interested, our relations were most cordial. Upon the announcement of his death I felt a deep sense of personal loss. He was a kindly, unassuming, polished gentleman of the old school, in whose heart there was no guile and in whose life there was no wrong. In the performance of his public duties he was earnest, conscientious, and steadfast.

Judge KINKAID was born in the State of Virginia, and went to Nebraska in 1881, where he resided, except while in Washington, until his death. He was a lawyer by profession, having graduated with honor from the law department of the University of Michigan in 1876, and entering practice soon thereafter. He was elected to the State Senate in Nebraska in 1883 and was made chairman of the judiciary committee of that body. He served as judge of the district court 13 years, and at the end of his third term was elected to the Fifty-eighth Congress, and served here continuously until his death, a period of 20 years, lacking only a few months of the uncompleted term. We miss him more than words can express.

Those who count the length of their service in this House by a long succession of terms see a great many changes—many friendships broken up. These experiences are the saddest things in life. It is said that death loves a shining mark, and so we are often called upon to follow to the grave those whom we most look up to and most admire and love. We can not claim for our departed colleague that he was a towering figure either in the law, in statecraft, or in legislative accomplishment, but he was wise unto his day and generation, efficient and faithful. He was one who won in the race of life fairly, and wore his honors with dignity, courtesy, and grace. He was born in an humble home where life was a struggle for existence, from which condition unaided by the power of money or social influence he made his way up to the zenith of his ambition in the American Congress and died in the Nation's arms. And so he has passed, this kindly man and faithful public servant, to his reward. To me it seemed during the latter months of his life that he had come to the time when he felt—

A little more tired at close of day,
A little less anxious to have our way,
A little less ready to scold and blame,
A little more care of a brother's name,
And so we are nearing the journey's end,
Where time and eternity meet and blend.

During these final months he appeared unnaturally depressed at times, as though some great sorrow had cast its shadow over his life, and I often thought of the lines:

If each man's inner sorrow
Were writ upon his brow,
How many would our pity have
Who have our envy now.

But since his death I have believed that his apparent depression was caused rather by a knowledge of his rapidly failing health.

It was my privilege to be one of the Members of the House designated by the Speaker to accompany his remains to their last resting place in Nebraska. The great outpouring of people at the funeral amply attested the high esteem in which Judge KINKAID was held in his home community. He had no immediate family, never having married, and so it may be that those who miss him most are his late associates in this House. So, "On this sacred Sabbath day, in this historic Chamber, let us consecrate ourselves to that fervent and all-absorbing patriotism, that high purpose to serve the people we are honored to represent, with the fidelity which characterized our departed friend."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I was for many years the friend and neighbor of MOSES P. KINKAID. Our districts joined. The interests of our people were largely identical. The territory he represented was familiar to me, and while I had not been fortunate enough to meet our friend prior to his election to Congress, I knew of him. I had heard many interesting stories of his services on the bench in the adjoining State of Nebraska and of the splendid work which he accomplished there. During his service in Congress I was intimately associated with him; as a colleague and a neighbor and friend I met him and frequently discussed questions and problems in which we were both interested. His was a lovable and delightful character. As has been suggested by one of the speakers this afternoon, Judge KINKAID, with his quiet ways, did not strike one as typical of the strenuous and breezy land from which he hailed and the stirring and tempestuous times of the frontier through which he lived. Nevertheless he was truly representative of his time and his section; he was a true pioneer with a genius for constructive work. It is known of all men in that section that he exercised for many years, as judge, a splendid influence for good, for law, and for order.

In this House, while quiet and unassuming, while occupying but little time on the floor in discussion, he exercised a very considerable influence, and he was at all times exceedingly active and earnest in furthering the interests of his section and his people. It was his good fortune to have his name attached to one of the best and one of the most beneficial laws enacted in our time for the settlement and development of our western country. He was always considerate of others, he was faithful to his duties, and he leaves behind him a fine record of good work. I am glad to have been his friend and associate and I shall always hold him in pleasing recollection as a true man and a good friend.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, Judge KINKAID and I were elected to Congress at the same time in 1902. During most of his 20 years' service here we served on the same committee. I came to know him quite intimately and had for him the very highest respect and esteem. He was a very able lawyer and his service was of great value to the constituency he represented. I can readily understand why his constituents returned him term after term with substantial unanimity, for those who knew him best could not but have the utmost confidence in both his ability and his faithfulness to every trust reposed in him. He was an exceedingly conscientious man and to every public duty devoted his best thought and energy. He was in truth and in fact what has been often designated as the noblest work of God, an honest man. No suspicion of any wrong or dishonest motive ever attached to him. He gave to every question upon which he was required to pass earnest, sincere, and conscientious consideration. The committees upon which he served will miss his wise counsel, and he will long be remembered by all of his colleagues with kindly thoughts and appreciation of his public services and admiration for his sterling character. When good men like him pass over to that other world of which we dream, but of which we know so little, they leave an impress on their associates here that helps to make the world better, and in giving expression to the esteem in which our colleague was held, and our appreciation of his sterling character, and of his long and meritorious public service, we hope and feel with confidence that wherever his spirit may dwell our loss may be his gain, and that with him all is well.

The Speaker resumed the chair.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] had intended to offer some remarks to-day in memory of Judge KINKAID, but are unavoidably detained from the House. I ask unanimous consent that all Members who wish may extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that all Members may have leave to extend their remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay my tribute of respect to the memory of our former colleague, the Hon. MOSES P. KINKAID, late a Representative in Congress from the sixth congressional district of Nebraska.

He was a native of the State of West Virginia, but in his early manhood he moved westward with the Star of Empire and made Nebraska his adopted State. In connection with his practice of the law, he entered immediately into the public activities of the community and State of his choice. As a lawyer he seemed to have an inclination toward official life and the people of his community recognized in him suitable qualifications for public service. Accordingly he was chosen in due time to represent them in the legislature of his State, and afterwards he was promoted to the district bench, where he served for several years with honor and distinction. Soon after his retirement from his judicial service he was elected to the Fifty-eighth Congress, and to each succeeding Congress, including the Sixty-seventh, making a continuous service of nearly 20 years, the longest period of congressional service ever rendered by any Nebraskan in this House. In view of the fluctuations of Nebraska politics during that period of time, we are naturally prompted to ask the question—

How did he maintain his political supremacy in his district for so many years? This question becomes more interesting because of the fact that his district had been under Democratic and Populistic control for ten or twelve years before his first election.

His campaign for reelection in 1904 was assisted very materially by the Roosevelt campaign of that year, which carried with it the Republican ticket generally throughout the State. The chief reasons for his success, however, will be found in his own character and personal services for the people of his district. He was the most successful handshaker ever known in Nebraska politics. In his conversations with men throughout his district he impressed them as deeply interested in their individual welfare. Instead of asserting positive opinions of his own for or against any particular question that may have been under consideration, he manifested such thoughtful recognition of the views of his friend as to win the confidence of the latter in an unusual degree. This characteristic played no small part in his political success; nevertheless, it was only a minor part. He applied himself so diligently to the actual needs of the people of his district and was so successful in securing favorable legislation in their interests as to increase that confidence and establish it firmly in his favor.

The most notable feature in his service record is the "Kinkaid Homestead Act." Many people in his district had found it impossible to succeed with only a quarter section of land because of the peculiar agricultural and grazing conditions of that section of the State. It was finally decided that an entire section of land would give the homesteader ample resources and opportunities for success. Accordingly the Kinkaid Act was passed granting homestead privileges for an entire section of Government land. That measure has had a very great success for that portion of our State.

The gratitude and confidence of the people who shared in its benefits have been very distinctly marked. Many times the fear has been manifested by them that they would lose their titles to their homesteads if Mr. KINKAID should die. This remarkable confidence and gratitude toward him made him in the later years invincible against any combination that the opposition might develop. In addition to this, no man in Congress ever paid more diligent attention to the minor details of business in behalf of his constituents than Mr. KINKAID. His service was limited only by his time, opportunity, and capacity to do what he could to benefit his people. Here we observe in his official record and life a true representative of popular government.

Note the extent to which public recognition of such qualifications on the part of public officials will go in maintaining popular government and shielding it from severe criticism.

During his long public career in the legislature, on the bench, and in Congress I have never heard anyone charge him with dishonesty. Those who have honored him with their confidence and support will surely find profound gratification in this fact. Every public official should keenly realize that such recognition by the people constitutes a large portion of the genuine rewards that can come from official service. The true servants of the public, especially those in the Congress of the United States, will prize this reward above all others. In the quiet, calm reflection of future years the consciousness of having served one's country honestly and helpfully will be a source of genuine delight.

During the closing years of his congressional career he devoted his attention and energy to legislation providing for the irrigation of arid lands. This subject appealed to him with tremendous force because it had been pressed in upon his attention by a wide range of observation. He had witnessed the transformation of arid lands into fields and gardens of richness and beauty. He found an inspiration in doing things that would reclaim the desert places and make them contribute to the wealth and happiness of mankind.

This story runs without limit. The wealth that it has brought to the people of the arid sections of our country can not be measured in dollars and cents. Thus in the midst of his congressional career he has extended the helping hand not only to his immediate constituents but likewise to the people of the entire country.

When we think of the brilliant achievements that have been sketched here to-day in eulogies for our former colleague, the Hon. JAMES R. MANN, of Illinois, and others who could be named without limit that have served their country faithfully and efficiently, we can not resist a feeling of regret that such useful lives should close prematurely at times of great need. But yesterday they were active here and their voices were ringing out with words of wisdom and guidance for all of us in our efforts to serve our country. To-day they are silent. How strange the contrast. Life seemed to hold them for a little time between two eternities. But life! Life! What is it? Whence came it? Whither is it going? It is only a little span between two eternities. Out of the past it came, into the future it goes. But what is its mission here? It builds homes, communities, states, nations. It erects cottages, temples, palaces, and great cities. May we not say, and may we not have the assurances of our deceased colleagues whose memories we revere to-day, that the great mission of the people of the United States of America is to lead the world into still larger measures of liberty, freedom, happiness, and prosperity.

DEATH OF HON. NESTOR MONTOYA.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my painful duty to report the death of our colleague, Hon. NESTOR MONTOYA, a Representative from the State of New Mexico, who died suddenly at his home yesterday morning. MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 251) providing for the filling of two vacancies that will occur on January 14, 1923, and March 1, 1923, respectively, in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

SPEECH OF MR. BOYDEN BEFORE THE REPARATION COMMISSION.

Mr. BORAH. I ask to have printed in the RECORD, in 8-point type, what is claimed by the press to be an official report of Mr. Boyden's speech a few days ago at the time the Reparation Commission had to do with declaring a default in the German payment.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, in 8-point type, as follows:

BOYDEN SPEECH ON REPARATION TREATY—OFFICIAL RECORD OF HIS PLEA IN EXTENUATION OF GERMANY'S WOOD AND COAL DEFAULT—SIDED WITH BRADBURY—ARGUED THAT REPARATION BOARD SHOULD REPORT EXTENT OF INTENTION ENTERING INTO FAILURE.

[By Edwin L. James. Copyright, 1923, by the New York Times Co. Special Cable to the New York Times.]

PARIS, January 13.—I have obtained an official record of what Roland Boyden, the American member of the Reparation Commission, said to the commission on January 9, when French action against Germany was decided upon. This procès verbal, read and approved by Mr. Boyden, shows that the American commissioner declared that the reparations provisions of the Versailles treaty were impossible; that this impossibility had seriously affected Germany's financial situation; that it had caused great loss of money to the Allies and would continue to do so until the treaty conditions were changed.

Mr. Boyden made it plain that he was speaking in a personal capacity. However, it was generally accepted by the other commissioners that his views coincided with those of the American Government.

In view of the approaching probability of further French action to carry out the provisions which the American delegate has characterized as impossible, special importance attaches to what he said.

The official record follows:

REMARKS MADE BY MR. BOYDEN AT THE REPARATION COMMISSION MEETING, JANUARY 9, 1923.

"Mr. Boyden stated that, not being one of the official judges as were his colleagues, it would be easy for him to remain silent, but he preferred to assume his own responsibility in his personal capacity as they assumed theirs in their official capacity. In English and American courts it was not uncommon for a person of judicial education to sit with official judges as 'amicus curiæ,' and, though in fact not a judge, to express his own personal view. Mr. Boyden endeavored to form an opinion upon the judicial aspect of the situation.

"Paragraph 17, annex 2, referred to default, and paragraph 18 referred to voluntary default. Mr. Boyden was in agreement with the decision of the commission that in both cases voluntary default was intended.

"What was voluntary default? One excuse for nonperformance would be recognized by all, viz, 'Force majeure,' but in Mr. Boyden's view the expression 'voluntary default' included other excuses. It meant the doing or failure to do something with knowledge at the time that action or failure to act might reasonably have an effect resulting in default.

"There was in Mr. Boyden's view a very considerable difference between the question then under discussion and the question as it had arisen in connection with the deliveries of timber. The demand for timber was a single demand. The main reason for the timber default seemed to consist in difficulties which arose from depreciation of the mark. These difficulties were of an extraordinary nature, such as had never before arisen in Germany, and it was easily conceivable that the persons who had to meet them did not at once see how to meet them, and did not realize at the time that their failure to do certain things promptly would result in default. Nevertheless Mr. Boyden was inclined to think that even in connection with wood there had been voluntary default within the meaning of the treaty.

COAL QUESTION DIFFERENT.

"The difference between the timber question and the coal question lay in the fact that the coal requirements were monthly requirements. The Germans faced with deficits in any month ought at once to have taken whatever precautions were necessary to see that those difficulties, whatever they had been, were avoided during the next month. They had failed to do that and the deficits had continued month after month.

"One further judicial point arose, to which Sir John Bradbury referred in connection with the purpose of paragraph 17. In Sir John Bradbury's opinion, the purpose of that paragraph was to enable the commission to appeal to the Governments only when the measures at its command had proved inadequate to enforce obedience. That was a perfectly comprehensible interpretation and explained in large part the difference between Sir John Bradbury and his colleague as to the action to be taken. Mr. Boyden's own reading of paragraph 17 was, however, different. In his view the commission was required to report any voluntary default forthwith, partly for the information of the Governments and partly to enable the Governments to take such action as they thought fit.

"Mr. Boyden recognized that previous action of the commission with respect to coal defaults had not been consistent with that interpretation, for the commission had not automatically reported defaults as they had arisen. Although this previous practice did not in his view represent the waiver of a right it was, nevertheless, a practical fact which should be taken into account, particularly by the Governments themselves in whatever action they might take.

"From the judicial point of view he was of the opinion that the argument put forward by the German delegation to the effect that in private contracts a deficiency of 10 per cent did not constitute a default was of no value. The treaty did not contemplate application of any such commercial custom to its provisions.

"With regard to the letter of March 21, Mr. Boyden considered the commission did not by its terms abandon its right under the treaty to report voluntary default. He did not remember exactly what views his colleagues then held, but it might be taken for granted that the language used would not have been accepted by certain delegates if they thought it eliminated the possibility of reporting voluntary default.

"The argument to which the German delegation attached most weight was that concerning the needs of Germany as indicated by her importation of nearly as much coal as she was delivering to the Allies. Legally that argument seemed to him applicable not to the question of voluntary default but to the decision of the commission as to the demands made on Germany.

"This argument would have weight if used to show that the commission's decision upon the amount of coal which Germany could supply without due interference with its industrial requirements was incorrect. But the commission's decision remained a decision unless changed, and Germany's industrial requirements had nothing to do with Germany's obligations to carry out the decision so long as it was not changed.

"But having expressed his view of the legal situation, Mr. Boyden desired to add several to the foregoing considerations, particularly in regard to Germany's need for coal and her importation of coal from abroad. The previous practice of the commission with respect to coal default and the commission's letter of March 21 had a practical bearing on the situation, which would naturally be taken into account by the Governments after the commission reported the default.

"The report by the commission on wood default seemed to him to be very defective. When reporting voluntary default it was of the utmost importance for the commission to report the extent of the intention which had entered into that default. The commission was a tribunal which found the accused guilty; punishment would be meted out by another tribunal. It was therefore of the greatest importance that the exact nature of the crime should be reported by the commission so that punishment by the Governments might fit the crime.

"Mr. Boyden agreed with Sir John Bradbury that the word 'punishment' was not appropriate, and that the real purpose of the provision was constructive. The real point was that the report should be made in such a way as to aid the Governments in adopting methods which would lead to constructive results. But it was of equal importance that the quality of the crime should be made plain in the report, whether the results were to be punitive or constructive. The commission in its report on coal deliveries should set forth not merely the fact of default but also the causes of default and all extenuating circumstances. It was only upon such a basis that the Governments could fairly perform their duty in the matter.

"If Mr. Boyden were asked to express in a few words what Germany had failed to do he would say Germany failed to take those exceptional and rather extraordinary measures month by month which were necessary to cope with difficulties which the experience of previous months had shown would arise.

"It was understandable that Germany's opinion of her own requirements should affect her attitude. Her opinion on this point and the facts on this point were both of great importance in connection with the extent of Germany's default. The report should emphasize the percentage which expressed the real extent of the default. While the default was important from a financial point of view, as M. Delacroix had explained, Germany had made a very considerable effort in a very difficult matter and had attained a very large measure of success.

"Mr. Boyden had hitherto confined himself to voluntary default on the part of Germany and the reasons which tend to lessen her culpability. If, however, he were making a report he would go further and would deal with the whole question of the failure of Germany in executing her obligations under the treaty and would explain that the conditions imposed by the treaty had been demonstrated by experience to be impossible and that that impossibility had affected not only Germany's financial situation and her financial obligations to the Allies but also her obligation like these in respect to coal and wood.

"He would further express the opinion which he had already expressed before the commission that continuance of these conditions had already resulted in great loss of money to the Allies and would result in still further loss so long as they were maintained."

REGENTS OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 251) providing for the filling of two vacancies that will occur on January 14, 1923, and March 1, 1923, respectively, in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress, which were on page 1, line 3, to strike out "two vacancies" and insert "vacancy"; on page 1, lines 7 and 8, to strike out "of John B. Henderson" and insert "that Frederick A. Delano"; on page 1, lines 8 and 9, to strike out "whose term will expire March 1, 1923" and insert "be appointed to succeed John B. Henderson, deceased"; and to amend the title so as to read "Joint resolution providing for the filling of two vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress."

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments, which were made necessary by the death of Mr. Henderson.

The motion was agreed to.

PURCHASE AND SALE OF FARM PRODUCTS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that House bill 12817, the unfinished business, may be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] may call up the rural credits measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the pending motion before the Senate on the unfinished business is a motion made by me to take up the bill (S. 4050) to provide for the purchase and sale of farm products, reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. The motion was made by me several weeks ago. The effect of the motion, if it prevails, would be to lay aside Senate bill 12817, the so-called ship subsidy bill, and take up that measure for consideration.

If the Senate is anxious to consider legislation in relation to the farmer, some of us at least, though we may be a small minority, think this bill of greater importance than any that has yet been reported. However that may be, and however Senators may disagree, it is a bill applying directly to the agricultural situation.

I have not been responsible for the delay in reaching a vote on my motion. By a unanimous-consent agreement entered into on the 21st of December last, in order to make it unnecessary for me to renew the motion from day to day, it was agreed that the motion should be considered pending whenever the ship subsidy bill was before the Senate. No other motion is in order on the ship subsidy bill until my motion is disposed of. No other motion to take up any other bill is in order until my motion is disposed of.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Nebraska a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is the Senator from Nebraska reading a unanimous-consent agreement which he is proposing to the Senate?

Mr. NORRIS. I am not reading at all; I am speaking extemporaneously.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator contend that it would be out of order, should his motion be agreed to, to move to proceed to the consideration of some other farm credit bill?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; I make no such contention. If the motion which I have made, and which is now pending, should prevail, that would place before the Senate the bill named in my motion. It would then be in order, of course, for any Senator to move to take up any other bill or any other subject, but my motion is not susceptible of amendment or substitution.

Mr. SIMMONS. I now understand the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. The motion must first be decided.

As I was about to state, Mr. President, I have not been responsible for the long delay in voting on the motion. I think those of us who favor this proposed legislation are now entitled to a vote on the motion, and I therefore object to laying aside the unfinished business until the motion shall have been disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to say that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is not responsible for the delay in voting upon his motion; there is no question about that. In order that we may dispose of the matter and proceed to the consideration of the farm-credit measures, which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] is now ready to bring up, I trust that we may have a vote upon the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, in a discussion of the pending motion some weeks ago I stated that I expected to vote for it. I made that statement because I believed that the subject of agricultural credits should take precedence over that of ship subsidy. I have been very glad to have the motion pending, in order that the Banking and Currency Committee might have an opportunity to consider the various bills before it and report favorably on some measure, in order that the Senate then might consider the question and agree upon some substitute for the bill reported out of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

I have never favored the so-called Norris bill. Certain features of it I opposed, particularly that which gave to the Federal Government the power to buy agricultural products, to hold them, and to operate warehouses and elevators; but there were one or two other features of the bill which I favored.

I am in favor of both bills, with some amendments, which have been reported out of the Committee on Banking and Currency. That bill has received the consideration of groups of Senators as well as of the Joint Commission on Agricultural Inquiry. It was recommended by that commission for passage a year ago; and it seems now, with the indorsement of the President of the United States as well as of other high officials of the Government who have seen the light, that we shall be able to enact that proposed legislation with certain amendments.

If the motion of the Senator from Nebraska shall prevail, of course we might substitute for the bill, to the consideration of which he proposes the Senate shall proceed, the measure reported out of the Committee on Banking and Currency, namely, the Lenroot-Anderson bill, provided a motion for that purpose should receive a majority of the votes here. However, here is the trouble about that: When that bill shall go to conference friends of the measure should be appointed the conferees upon it; in other words, it would not be fair to those who shall vote for the Lenroot-Anderson bill, with or without modifications, that gentlemen should be appointed as conferees on the bill in the conference between the House and the Senate who are opposed to the measure and who might favor the Norris bill. Since the adoption of the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] would bring before the Senate the so-called Norris bill, if the Lenroot-Anderson bill should be substituted for it, the Presiding Officer might naturally appoint Senators as conferees on the part of the Senate who have championed the Norris bill and who have favored the motion to take it up. They rank high on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. The Senate would then be in the attitude of having Senators as conferees on the bill who did not favor what the Senate had done but who favored the Norris proposal.

It seems to me that the best thing to do, since the Lenroot-Anderson bill has been reported out of the committee and is now on the calendar, is to vote down the motion of the Senator from Nebraska and then take up the Lenroot-Anderson bill, consider that measure and pass it, and thus insure that there shall be appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate in the conference between the two Houses those who are wholeheartedly in favor of the Lenroot-Anderson bill. For that reason I shall vote against the motion of the Senator from Nebraska with the hope and, indeed, the expectation, I may say, that immediately—for I understand that is the program on the other side of the Chamber—the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] will temporarily withdraw the ship subsidy bill, and that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] will then move the consideration of the Lenroot-Anderson bill or the Capper bill, as the case may be, seriatim, in order that the Senate may consider and pass those two measures immediately and get them over to the other House and into conference.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely wish to state that if the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] shall be voted down, I shall then ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, in order that the Senator from Connecticut may call up the bill reported from his committee.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator from Connecticut if that is his intention?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; it is my intention to call up for consideration Senate bill 4280, which is the so-called Capper bill.

Mr. HARRISON. It is the intention that the Capper bill shall be first called up and disposed of and that then the Senate shall immediately proceed to the consideration of the Lenroot-Anderson bill?

Mr. McLEAN. That is correct.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to ask the Senator from Connecticut another question. Suppose unanimous consent shall not be granted for the consideration of the bill named by him; will the Senator from Connecticut then make the motion that the Senate proceed to its consideration?

Mr. McLEAN. I certainly shall do so.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, that is all I desire shall be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the argument made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] is both ingenious and unique. I presume he is speaking not only for himself but, in view of the questions which other Senators have asked, also in behalf of several other Senators. The main object to be attained, in order that the farmers of America may have the benefit of some good legislation, is that the conference committee on the part of the Senate shall be appointed from the membership of the Banking and Currency Committee rather than from the membership of the Agricultural Committee. Of course, Mr. President, the farmers of America ought to understand that those Members of the Senate who are on the Agricultural Committee, which is charged with the responsibility of dealing with the interests of the farmers, are not the friends of legislation for the farmers, but that they must look to the Banking and Currency Committee to secure such legislation, and that there must be selected from the Banking and Currency Committee members of the conference committee on the part of the Senate in order to secure legislation for the benefit of the farmers. Far be it from me, Mr. President, to cast any reflection upon the members of the Banking and Currency Committee or to question their sincerity or their intention to do what in their judgment is the proper thing to be done.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McLEAN. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Lenroot bill has been recommended by the Joint Commission on Agricultural Inquiry and that the members of that commission on the part of the Senate were the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. It does not seem to me that the farmers were ignored so far as the membership of that joint commission was concerned, and the Lenroot bill attempts to carry out the suggestions and conclusions of that commission.

Mr. NORRIS. The argument of the Senator from Connecticut is likewise ingenious and is on all fours with the argument of the Senator from Mississippi. The impression may be gathered from what the Senator from Connecticut has said that the bill which he is going to ask to have considered next has been recommended by members of the Senate Agricultural Committee. The fact remains that the bill has been reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which I believe none of the Senators whom he mentions are members, so consequently none of them could be on the conference committee.

Why do Senators become suspicious at once? I have not made an argument against that bill; I have not said a word against it; I am not fighting that bill; I am merely calling attention to the fact that the argument made by the Senator from Mississippi, backed up by the Senator from Connecticut, would result in placing on the conference committee members of the Banking and Currency Committee rather than members of the Agricultural Committee. In answer to that the Senator from Connecticut calls attention to the fact that the bill to which he refers was drawn up by the joint commission of which certain Members of the Senate, whom he named, were members; but, Mr. President, those Senators will not be on the conference committee. The Senator desires friends of the proposed legislation on the conference committee, and that is proper, and it may be implied from what the Senator has said that the Senators mentioned would probably be on the conference committee, whereas anyone who will look into the question will know that they will not be members of the conference committee when that committee shall have been appointed. However, I took the floor principally for the purpose of resenting in a way the imputation that in order to secure legislation for the benefit of the farmer the Agricultural Committee of the Senate must be ignored and the members of that committee must be kept off the conference committee.

Mr. President, I have not examined it sufficiently to know whether the suggestions of the originators of the bill reported by the Senator from Connecticut have been carried out in the bill as presented from the Banking and Currency Committee; I do not know to what extent they may have amended the bill.

Now let me return to the argument of the Senator from Mississippi, and let me take it up where I was interrupted by the Senator from Connecticut. The Senator from Mississippi has outlined a parliamentary procedure that will undoubtedly not take place. If the motion which I have made should prevail, he has assumed in that event that the Capper bill and the Lenroot bill, neither one of which I am opposing, and which have been reported from the Banking and Currency Committee, will be substituted for my bill after it shall have been taken up. It is not at all likely that that will happen. On the other hand, the probabilities are that if the motion should prevail and the bill named in the motion shall be laid before the Senate, it will be followed by a motion of the Senator from Connecticut to take up for consideration one of the other bills, and he has already told us that it is not going to be the bill that was recommended by the joint commission.

If the majority of the Senate believe that bill to be of more importance to the agriculturists of the country than this one, they will vote to take it up; and this bill then will be displaced, the same as my motion, if it prevails, will displace the ship subsidy bill; so that the conferees will come from the sanctimonious committee of the Senate known as the Banking and Currency Committee. On the other hand, if that does not take place, if the procedure outlined by the Senator from Mississippi is followed, and all of this bill that I have moved to take up is stricken out except the enacting clause, and that bill is inserted, I assume that the Presiding Officer will appoint members of the Banking and Currency Committee to the conference committee, and not members of the Agricultural Committee. I should think he ought to do that; and certainly the Presiding Officer has no prejudice in favor of the Agricultural Committee. No one will charge that; so that if that happens the dear old Banking and Currency Committee would probably have its members on the conference committee just the same. So far as I am concerned, if that does happen, I think they ought to be put on. I would not want to be on the conference committee. I am not a candidate for a position on the conference committee, simply because I believe in all fairness that when that bill passes, whether it is now or later, the conference committee ought to be named from the Banking and Currency Committee. I think that would be fair.

Mr. President, there ought to be no conflict between the bill that I have moved to take up and either one of the bills mentioned by the Senator from Connecticut. If the Senators have only been fooling along, using this motion that I have made as a bumper, waiting for the Banking and Currency Committee to get ready, then they will vote down this motion. Then the motion will be defeated, and it can be followed by another motion by the Senator from Connecticut.

I am willing to agree now, if it will help the bill that I have proposed, that I shall not be one of the members of the conference committee if it shall pass. Get them from the Banking and Currency Committee or some other committee, if you want to. I am not going to argue the merits of this question, because I have been over it once, and I realize that whatever I may say can not affect and will not affect the vote of any Member of the Senate; but, according to my belief, there is not a bill pending in the Senate that will do the farmers of America as much good as the one that is included in this motion. All I am asking is that we have a fair, honest vote. If a majority of the Senate want to turn it down, they will have their way. There is nothing particularly bad about it. I think they will make a mistake if they do it, but I may be wrong; they may be right. Whatever the result, I of course will, as gracefully as an awkward man knows how to do, accept the verdict; but I am unwilling that there shall be any camouflage here upon this motion. I am unwilling that we should give out to the country an insinuation that if this bill is taken up, and the other bill finally is taken up and passed, something is going to happen on the conference committee on the part of the chairman of the Agricultural Committee that is unfair or unjust to the farmers of America. I am unwilling that we should vote on it on the assumption, even, that members of the Agricultural Committee who were members of the joint commission will be on the conference committee when the other bill is passed.

I expect to support both of the other bills, unless I am convinced upon the discussion of them that there is more harm than good in them. I am favorably inclined toward them—toward the subjects, at least. I think we ought to legislate on them. I do not want the Senate or the country to get in the attitude of placing those bills against this one. All of them ought to be passed. They are not antagonistic. There is no reason why all of them should not be passed, and all be enforced, and good come from all of them.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, this motion has been pending for some time. For a week or two weeks, at least, it has been before the Senate. Inasmuch as if the motion should prevail it would displace the ship subsidy bill, it has met with considerable discussion; and, the ship subsidy bill having been from time to time laid aside at the request of the chairman of the committee, the motion itself has been laid aside.

For over 10 days I have had a mass of material which I wanted to submit to the Senate bearing especially on the question of ship subsidy, but I have had no opportunity; and I am a little afraid that some of it will be somewhat stale and perhaps out of date before we take up the ship subsidy bill again. However, it is material and pertinent, and perhaps will keep to the time when the chairman of the committee is ready to allow the Senate to proceed with the ship subsidy measure.

It has been heralded through the press from time to time that those opposed to ship subsidy were resorting to tactics here which amounted almost to a filibuster to prevent the consideration of that measure. The fact is, however, that we have been ready and prepared to discuss ship subsidy every day since the bill has been here. Some of us have been anxious for an opportunity to continue the discussion, but the bill has been laid aside. I do not criticize the chairman of the committee. He saw that in the public interest that was the proper course to pursue when we had supply bills before the Senate, and that he should lay aside his bill and let us consider the appropriation bills. Those bills have been considered promptly and expeditiously, without any attempt at delay on the part of anybody; and yet, because those bills have taken the place of the ship subsidy bill, opponents of ship subsidy have been charged with delaying matters in order that there might not be a vote on the ship subsidy bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not say that the chairman of the committee has done that at all.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator knows that I have not.

Mr. FLETCHER. I know that the Senator has been quite reasonable about that and has had no part in it; but some newspapers, and particularly those newspapers that apparently like the name of subsidy, to which no sort of terror comes when the word "subsidy" is used, that are especially fond of it, apparently, want to make capital out of that situation at the expense of those who in good faith believe that legislation to be vicious and bad.

However, the time has come now when we are to act upon rural-credit legislation. I think both sides of the Chamber are anxious to proceed with that question. We may have some little difference in detail as to whether or not the measures now proposed before the Senate entirely meet the situation, but we are in agreement upon the broad proposition that something ought to be done to meet the needs of agriculture by providing a financial system that will accommodate the farmers in the matter of their short-time personal credits, and in the matter of the marketing and distribution of their products.

The question now, therefore, is which one of these measures will be taken up. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], having made this motion some time ago, desires now to have it settled, and desires a vote upon it; and I feel that we ought to accommodate him in that respect, because we are confronted with a situation where this subject of rural credits is to be taken up by the Senate in one form or another. Therefore I do not care to continue the discussion of the motion any further, since the Senator from Nebraska desires it to be acted upon at this time, and I am prepared to vote on the question.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, as I have stated heretofore upon the floor of the Senate, I am not in favor of the bill known as the Norris bill reported by the Agricultural Committee; but frankness requires me to say that I know, from letters and resolutions that have come to my attention, that there are a great many farmers in this country who are in favor of the Norris bill. There are organizations of farmers in the United States who have expressly approved that bill and who believe that it will afford agriculture in certain sections of the country more ample relief than any of the other bills.

I do not agree with them. I do not think it would be wise legislation. I do not like the principle involved in it, and I do not believe that it will meet the evil of which the farmers complain; but, Mr. President, I should not like to cast a vote summarily to cut off this body from consideration of that measure. I think it is entitled to have the consideration of the Senate. If we should vote not to take it up, that would be construed as a vote not to consider it, and I am not willing to cast that sort of vote. Opposed to it as I am, I am perfectly willing that it shall have a test in the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. May I call the Senator's attention to the parliamentary situation that would arise? If the Norris bill is taken up, of course it is in order to offer an amendment in the form of a substitute to that bill, but no other substitute can be offered to it until that is voted upon. The Senator has a rural credit bill; and if the Norris bill should be taken up, and the chairman of the committee should offer the committee bill as a substitute for the Norris bill, the Senator never would have an opportunity of offering his bill and having a vote upon it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Norris bill is taken up the Senate can consider it, and then a motion can be made to take up some other bill as against that; and that motion will prevail if a majority of the Senate, after consideration of the Norris bill, decide that they prefer some other bill.

If any bill is offered as a substitute, before the vote is taken upon the substitute, it will be subject to amendment, and if the friends of agriculture are disposed to favor the principles of that bill, it can be amended so as to make it meet the majority views of the Senate.

I do not apprehend any complications which might prevent the Senate from expressing its real opinion upon this subject. I think we might as well discuss all of these measures at one time, and out of all of them evolve some measure which will be satisfactory to the Senate, and that we can do by the process of amendment and substitution if we so desire, or we can take up either of the other two bills which have been reported from the committee upon a motion to proceed to its consideration and thus displace the Norris bill. I am loath to cast a vote which would seem to deny the Senate an opportunity even to consider this measure, which I know a great many farmers in the country favor and advocate.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the most important matter to be enacted by the Congress before adjournment is a rural credits bill. I think the measure brought before Congress along that line should be confined to that subject. The bills which have been reported by the Banking and Currency Committee, and which will be taken up if this motion is defeated, are confined to rural credits. There are many matters in the Norris bill which do not appertain to rural credits, and with the assurance that if this motion is defeated, if unanimous consent is not given for the consideration of those bills, a motion will be made to take up those two measures reported by the Banking and Currency Committee, which confine their enactments to rural credits, I shall vote against the Norris motion. I think the wise thing for the Senate to do is to bring currency legislation before the Senate, and then after that bill has been made the unfinished business the bill offered by the Senator from North Carolina and other bills which confine their enactments to currency legislation can properly be considered. I think that is the wisest and best way to get currency legislation at this session of Congress, to make currency legislation the unfinished business, and postpone action on other measures which embody other things.

Entertaining this view, I shall vote against the consideration of the Norris bill, with the assurance that if unanimous consent is not given to take up the two measures reported from the Banking and Currency Committee, the chairman of that committee will make a motion to take them up and make them the unfinished business.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I have already announced that that is my purpose.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I am for all three of the measures which have been mentioned in this discussion. I had a part in framing the two credit measures. As a member of the Joint Agricultural Commission, which worked for some three months on rural-credits legislation, I joined with the commmission in reporting what is known as the Lenroot-Anderson bill. I think that is a good measure, and it should be passed. I introduced what has been referred to here as the Capper bill, which I do not believe will interfere with the Lenroot bill. I hope to see both bills passed.

As a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I voted in the committee to report the Norris bill, and I expect to support it, with possibly some slight amendments, because I believe it is a good measure.

It seems now to be a question simply as to which one of these measures shall have first consideration. I would like to see the Lenroot bill and the Capper bill, which are really rural-credit measures, have first consideration, and then I shall vote for any motion looking to the consideration of the bill introduced by the Senator from Nebraska. In voting against the motion of the Senator from Nebraska I shall not do so in any spirit of antagonism toward his legislation, but because I believe the rural-credit measures should have precedence in consideration in the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the argument of the Senator from Kansas is likewise ingenious. He says he is in favor of the bill I have moved to take up, and I am not questioning his sincerity for a moment. I know he was favorable to it in the committee, and voted to report it. But it seems to me the course he proposes we shall take is a very unwise one. If we are to lay that bill aside now to take up something else which has been reported subsequently, the probabilities are that before we get through with that subject some other bill will be reported, and we will lay aside again the bill I have reported. In the meantime the 4th of March is approaching, which means death to everything that is undisposed of.

The fact is that the bill I have moved to take up has been on the calendar of the Senate for weeks. These other bills, which the Senator from Kansas wants to put ahead of it, have been here for only a few days, having been reported just last week, I think, just a day or two ago. If there is any difference in the order in which they should be taken up, then it seems to me the precedence ought to be given to the bill reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

I would like to say to the Senator from Kansas that at this time, by this motion, the bill reported by that committee has been put on trial for its life. It will either be taken up by this motion, or it will be dead for this session of Congress. Let nobody be deceived on that proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nebraska that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4050. On that question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

So Mr. NORRIS's motion was rejected.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

HOSPITALIZATION OF DISABLED EX-SERVICE MEN.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have been advised that the Senate will to-morrow, or possibly not later than Wednesday, proceed to the consideration of the independent offices appropriation bill, which carries, of course, the appropriation for maintaining the Veterans' Bureau.

I have here a tabular statement prepared by the Veterans' Bureau showing the various hospitals being constructed and the number of ex-service men in the various hospitals, and also showing the number of occupied and unoccupied beds. It is an interesting and creditable statement, and has been sent to me by the Veterans' Bureau; hence it occurred to me that it would be illuminative to Senators interested in the matter. In order that it may appear in the RECORD to-morrow morning and be considered by them before the independent offices appropriation bill comes before the Senate, in order that Senators may see the precise situation as to each hospital, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the Director of the Veterans' Bureau, together with the tabular statement to which I have referred, giving in detail, as I said, not only the cost but the number of beds occupied and unoccupied in the various hospitals and various other important and pertinent data regarding the hospitalization of ex-service men.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I think that all the material to which the Senator refers was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Friday last, in the proceedings of the House of Representatives of that day, and I suggest to the Senator that it is scarcely necessary to print it twice.

Mr. ASHURST. The careful and painstaking Senator from Pennsylvania is of opinion that I would attempt to print in the RECORD matter which has already been printed therein. I am sure after he has been with us some time he will see that it is not a habit of the Senate to put in the RECORD matter already printed therein. The details which I am now offering have never been printed in the RECORD in this form. I am sorry that the Senator, upon whom I am so anxious to make a good impression, would think that I would set up such a precedent here, to wit, attempting to have something printed in the RECORD which had already appeared in the RECORD, because, of course, that has never been done and I trust we never will do so.

The learned Senator will perceive upon a perusal of this statement that it is much in detail, but he is performing a useful task in calling the attention of the Senate to the figures and the illuminating data put in the RECORD by Representative MADDEN on last Friday.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator will give me credit for the same good intentions he claims for himself and for which I gladly give him credit. I was only trying to call his attention to something I thought he had overlooked, because there appear in fine print about 10 pages of detail regarding each hospital in the proceedings of the House of Representatives of last Friday. I thought the Senator might, perhaps, have overlooked it. If he knows what it is and has something different, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be understood, however, that if it was printed in the RECORD of last Friday's proceedings, it will not be printed again in the RECORD.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I believe that I shall be obliged to read the matter I offer for printing. I have already stated that the matter which I intend to put in the RECORD has not been printed before in this form. But now, had it been printed before, I would print it again if I had to read all day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not understand that the Senator from Utah entered an objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not want to be catechised any more about whether that which I offer has already been printed in the RECORD. Why so much anxiety as to whether or not I might happen to place in the RECORD something about a wounded soldier that has already been printed? I will read that data——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. No; I do not yield to my distinguished friend.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May the Chair say to the distinguished Senator from Arizona——

Mr. ASHURST. The Chair may say anything to me parliamentarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No objection has been made to the Senator's request.

Mr. ASHURST. For example, I have just received the following letter:

UNITED STATES VETERANS' HOSPITAL,
Tucson, Ariz., January 9, 1923.

Senator HENRY F. ASHURST,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR ASHURST: I wish to call your attention to the case of a Spanish War veteran, Corlis E. Hinds, who died at United States Veterans' Hospital, Tucson, Ariz., from tuberculosis contracted in line of duty and of the refusal of the Veterans' Bureau to bury the body, to ship it to his wife in California, or to bear the slightest expense of the funeral.

The deceased left no funds for burial, nor did his wife have any.

The commanding officer of this hospital, Major James, was unable to bury body or ship the remains to his wife in California because of a Veterans' Bureau regulation which states it will not bear any expense of the funeral of Spanish War veterans.

As far as the Veterans' Bureau was concerned, it could go to potter's field.

Through the kindness and generosity of the patients here, sufficient money was raised by a collection amongst them to buy a coffin and ship the body to his wife for burial in the Soldiers' Home Cemetery, Sawtelle, Calif.

Only since last August have Spanish War veterans been admitted to United States veterans' hospitals, and this is the first case of a death amongst them. It no doubt will be duplicated, and I am sure the patients do not feel they should dig in their pockets to bury one of their comrades who rightly should be buried by the Government.

Knowing of your past work for the welfare of ex-service men, I trust you will do whatever is necessary to prevent a recurrence of this case.

It will be greatly appreciated if you will get authority for Major James, the commanding officer here, to pay the funeral expenses in this past case also, so that the money collected for the funeral ($140) may go to the widow and children of the deceased, who are destitute.

Respectfully yours, JAMES J. WEBB.

There is plenty of time, Mr. President, to consider ship subsidy bills, but if a Senator inferentially suggests he is going to ask that certain data regarding ex-service men's hospitalization be printed, Senators became astute and quick to suggest that care should be used lest perhaps a sentence about ex-service men that was in the RECORD of last Friday might get in again.

The data I sought to place in the RECORD is important information and has been prepared by the Veterans' Bureau at my special request. If Senators will carefully study the same they will obtain copious data respecting the vital subject of hospitalization of ex-service men.

I now avail myself of the privilege. No; the right. No; but the duty of explaining to the Senate how a little more courage and a little more of the capacity to bear criticisms on the part of the Veterans' Bureau might relieve hundreds of soldiers.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ASHURST. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say that the Senator from Arizona is mistaken. What the Senator from Utah said was that, of course, it was understood, if matter has been once printed in the RECORD the Senator from Arizona would not wish to have it printed in the RECORD again.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Utah is correct in that statement.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from Arizona that it is understood between the two Houses that whenever anything has been once printed in the RECORD, it shall not again be printed in the RECORD. I shall not object to the matter the Senator offers being printed, and I never offered such an objection in any way, shape, or form. I merely asked the Senator from Arizona the same question which I have asked other Senators a hundred and perhaps a thousand times on the floor of the Senate, and the Senator from Arizona is the first Senator who has ever taken exception to the asking of that question.

Mr. ASHURST. I am the first Senator who has ever taken exception to the question?

Mr. SMOOT. And I thought his doing so was really out of place, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. I know the Senator from Utah thinks my doing so is out of place, but I am the judge in such a case. The Senator said, "It is understood that if the matter has been printed in the RECORD heretofore, it shall not go again into the RECORD," but I will not submit to such a censorship and such a revision of my humble contributions to the RECORD. I am the one who should say whether or not a matter which I present has previously been printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from Arizona had assured me that the matter had not previously been printed in the RECORD, there would not have been a word said about it.

Mr. ASHURST. Why is it that the question has not been asked as to whether matters in regard to the ship subsidy bill which Senators have desired printed in the RECORD have previously been printed in the RECORD?

Mr. SMOOT. No one, so far as I am aware, has in the discussion of that bill asked that matters which have previously been printed in the RECORD shall again be so printed.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong any controversy with the Senator from Utah, nor do I wish to delay action of the Senate on the pending bills. Least of all do I wish to take part in any action here which shall savor of a filibuster against any of these bills, but no subject is more important or should more truly engage our attention than the care of our disabled soldiers.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, all the Senator from Arizona has got to do—and, of course, I shall take his word as to the matter—is to state, as he has stated now, that what he desires printed in the RECORD has not previously been so printed. There will not be another word on my part in reference to the subject, and what he desires may be printed in the RECORD. So far as any Senator in this body is concerned, no one wishes to object to any matter going into the RECORD which might benefit the veterans of the World War or assist in making the provisions which have been made for them better than they now are.

Mr. ASHURST. I believe the Senator from Utah is just as anxious and as earnest about hospitalizing the soldiers as am I, or as is any other Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Arizona knows that I am.

Mr. ASHURST. But the Senator from Utah is too busy a man; he has not the time—no Senator has the time if he is going to do anything else—to give particular attention to the hospitalization question. I have given the subject especial attention. The Senator from Utah can not do so; there are not sufficient hours in the day for even the Senator to make himself familiar with all the details regarding hospitalization, though he is familiar with most of the subjects which are before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Arizona knew that I agreed with him, for it was not 15 minutes previously that he brought the question to my attention and I agreed with him absolutely.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; that is true.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question of my desire at all. I have no wish to do anything which would in any way interfere with the Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not wish to prolong the controversy, but I wish to conclude what I started to say, to wit, that Senators should read this tabular statement. That is all I have to say, Mr. President, and I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter referred to by the Senator from Arizona will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES VETERANS' BUREAU,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR,
Washington, January 13, 1923.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR ASHURST: There is transmitted herewith statement on hospitals which you requested Thursday. This statement includes all hospitals available to the United States Veterans' Bureau, whether under the direct jurisdiction of the United States Veterans' Bureau or under the control of other Government agencies, such as the Army, Navy, National Soldiers' Homes, or the Public Health Service. It is believed that the notes at the bottom of this statement adequately explain the data presented. You will note that the item "Capital cost" is rather fully explained, since this item involves a very definite interpretation in order that the data presented for the several hospitals may be consistent. There has been eliminated from this cost statement expenditures for ordinary repairs and maintenance of buildings and property, and there have been included only such items as seem to be definite improvements and subsequently enhance the value of the real property. You will note that under this item there have been included certain expenditures at hospitals operated by the Army, Navy, and soldiers' homes. These expenditures have been made by these services out of funds allotted to them from the United States Veterans' Bureau, or from the first Langley bill in the instance of the soldiers' homes. You will note further that this item includes not only known obligations or expenditures but also estimated expenditures where the project is being planned at the present time or where the contracts have not to date been awarded. No separation has been made by individual hospitals showing the classification of the expenditures made, and it is true in a number of instances that the amount shown includes not only the first and second Langley bill obligations, or estimated obligations, but also such expenditures as may have been made at some prior date from various available appropriations.

In regard to the first Langley bill, you are advised that the entire sum of $18,600,000, the control of which was under the Treasury Department, has been entirely obligated or allotted. In regard to the second Langley bill, you are advised that the entire appropriation of $17,000,000 has been obligated or allotted. From neither of these appropriations can further allocation of funds be made for other hospital projects than those already agreed upon.

With regard to the supplemental information which you requested relative to Arizona, you are advised that at the present time in the two Veterans' Bureau hospitals at Arizona there is a total of 65 nurses employed—46 at United States Veterans' Hospital No. 50, Prescott, Ariz., and 19 at United States Veterans' Hospital No. 51, Tucson, Ariz. The total personnel employed at the hospital at Prescott numbers 462, while the total personnel employed at the hospital at Tucson numbers 119. With regard to the number of and type of buildings at each of these institutions, you are advised that at Hospital No. 50, Prescott, Ariz., there is a total of 71 buildings, classified as follows: Hollow tile, 18; concrete blocks, 19; brick, 7; wooden frame, 23; corrugated iron, 1; reinforced concrete, 2; iron, 1. At the United States Veterans' Hospital No. 51, Tucson, Ariz., there is a total of approximately 70 buildings, 50 of which are cottages for patients, each accommodating approximately six patients; the balance of the buildings are for utilities and administration. All of these buildings are of temporary frame construction.

With regard to the civil institutions used in the State of Arizona, you are advised that at the present time this bureau is utilizing but five hospitals in that State, as follows:

Arizona Hospital, Tucson, Ariz., 8 patients.
Hotel Rest Sanatorium, Tucson, Ariz., 1 patient.
Phoenix Sanatorium, Phoenix, Ariz., 3 patients.
St. Joseph's Hospital, Phoenix, Ariz., 15 patients.
St. Luke's Home, Phoenix, Ariz., 5 patients.

It is hoped that the above information and the information in the attached statement will be suitable for your purpose and in every way satisfactory. However, should you desire any additional data relative to this or any other activity in this bureau, I should be very glad to furnish it to you upon your request.

Very truly yours,

C. R. FORBES, Director.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

During the delivery of Mr. ASHURST's speech,

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not like to interrupt the Senator, but I have an engagement with the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations and I am wondering if the Senator would permit my request to lay aside the unfinished business to be acted upon?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I thank the Senator very much.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business, House bill 12817, may be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RURAL MARKETING AND CREDIT FACILITIES.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4280.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4280) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States; to amend the Federal reserve act; to amend the Federal farm loan act; to extend and stabilize the market for United States bonds and other securities; to provide fiscal agents for the United States, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency with amendments.

After Mr. ASHURST's speech,

Mr. McLEAN obtained the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator yield to me to suggest the absence of a quorum? I think we ought to have a quorum here.

Mr. McLEAN. If the Senator desires it, it is immaterial to me.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Connecticut, I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

THE PROBLEMS WHICH CONFRONT THE FARMER.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, there are so many measures pending in the Senate and the House which seek to create additional credit facilities for the agricultural interests that I want to submit a few observations which bear upon rural credits in general. I think I am as anxious to help the farmer as is any Member of this body, but I do not want to invite him to another billion-dollar dance at the close of which he will be called upon to pay the musicians. I think he has been pretty well fed up on that variety of entertainment. It is for that reason that I think we should consider the credit facilities which are now accessible to the farmer, and the extent to which they have been enjoyed, in order that we may clearly understand the real needs of agriculture in the way of additional credits.

A great deal has been said in praise and criticism of the Federal reserve system and the commercial banks of the country during the past four years. I have no desire to question the motives of those who feel that the Federal reserve system has not done its full duty by agriculture, but I do think we ought to give due weight to the actual accomplishments of existing credit systems in order that we may act intelligently in our desire to supplement them with new plans and projects for the multiplication of credit and discount facilities wholly experimental in their nature.

I think we must all agree, certainly those of us who view the operations of the Federal reserve system without prejudice, that expansion of credits is one of its easiest accomplishments, and that the large number of regional banks tends to stimulate rather than control inflation. The local statesman in any one of the 12 districts is soon persuaded by his constituents that attempts to restrict credits is injurious to business, and that banking officials who decline to grant or renew loans are in a conspiracy to dry up the sources of prosperity, and that constantly rising prices create a wider margin of profit between cost of production and market values. When prices are going up regional banks in large industrial and manufacturing centers are pressed to extend loans to accommodate new enterprises and keep those in existence at the highest pitch of production. Regional banks in the agricultural sections are besieged to extend credits to allow the farmers to increase their production at constantly increasing cost. It is then we realize the necessity of keeping the national banking system in the control of men able to withstand the clamor of special interests, men who will curb undue inflation whenever and wherever it threatens seriously to disturb the whole credit structure of the Nation. Once the Federal Reserve Board becomes the football of politics instead of our supreme court of finance, entirely free from the influence of political appointees and politicians, the cooperation between the reserve banks, anticipated by its founders, will become less and less effective in its efforts to allay sectional prejudices. I want to call attention to the views expressed by Senator OWEN in the Financial Chronicle July 30, 1921.

I quote Senator OWEN because we all know he was chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency when the Federal reserve act was framed, and I think he fairly represents the views of those who criticize what is called the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board. I quote him as follows:

> The Federal Reserve Board was created to control, regulate, and stabilize credit in the interest of all the people. * * * It is the most gigantic financial power in all the world. * * Instead of using this great power as the Federal reserve act intended that it should be used, the board abdicated. Instead of using this power in the interests of all the people, the bankers included, it delegated this power to the bankers.

About this time the governor of the Federal Reserve Board outlined his views of the responsibilities of the board and its powers under the act in a letter to Senator SMOOT, which was published in the Federal Reserve Bulletin, August, 1921, a portion of which I quote:

> In view of the fact that the 12 Federal reserve banks are independent bodies corporate and are controlled and directed each by its own board of directors, subject only to the general supervision of the Federal Reserve Board, whose authority with respect to discount is confined principally to defining eligible paper in accordance with the terms of section 13 of the Federal reserve act, it seems to me that the statement which many, both in Congress and on the outside, urge be issued by the Federal Reserve Board, stating that the Federal reserve banks will adopt certain policies in connection with the rediscounting of agricultural paper, would have to be made by the Federal reserve banks themselves. The Federal Reserve Board has no power to interfere with the discretion given or the responsibility imposed by law upon the directors of a Federal reserve bank with respect to passing upon the merits of eligible paper offered for discount.
> Congress did not establish a central bank in this country. It established 12 banks under the general supervision of the Federal Reserve Board, which does not exercise banking functions. These functions are exercised exclusively by the Federal reserve banks.

Anyone familiar with the language of the Federal reserve act will, I think, agree that the powers of the Federal Reserve Board are strictly limited, as stated by the governor of the board. Congress did not create a central bank and the banking functions are exercised exclusively by the 12 Federal reserve banks, and, of course, the primary loans are entirely within the discretion of the member banks.

Later on I shall call attention to bulletins issued by the board indicating its purposes and efforts to use its powers in the interests of all the people, in order to show that no matter what the actual record of the board may evidence, or the limitations may be as expressed in the law itself, critics of high standing will always be found at the peak of high prices who will convince a large portion of the American people that the board has abdicated its functions in the interests of Wall Street or some other street.

In the crisis of 1920 and 1921 the fate of the farmer, though perhaps more aggravated, was precisely similar to that which he must inevitably suffer when the tide of inflation begins to ebb. When the patience of the consumer is exhausted and the contagion of restriction in purchases gets under way the prices of foods and clothing fabrics are the first to fall, and, generally speaking, their descent is not checked until the purchasing power of the day's work of the farmer is below that of the average wage paid to men engaged in other occupations. Granting that the seasonal requirements of the farmer demand that any banking system that is to be of permanent benefit to him must accommodate itself to natural limitations under which he must operate and over which he has no control, we reply that it was for this very reason the framers of the Federal reserve system gave to the Federal Reserve Board wide discretion in its definition of agricultural paper eligible for rediscount, and doubled its length of maturity over that enjoyed by what is generally understood to be commercial paper, and this notwithstanding the fact that the basic purpose of the Federal reserve system was to provide an elastic currency secured by short-time, self-liquidating commercial paper representing actual transactions—that is, paper which is used to finance the sale of goods, the proceeds of which would be used for its retirement. Section 13 of the Federal reserve act provides that notes, drafts, and bills drawn or issued for agricultural purposes or based upon live stock and having a maturity not exceeding six months may be discounted in an amount to be limited to a percentage of the capital of the Federal reserve bank, to be ascertained and fixed by the Federal Reserve Board, whereas the maturity of commercial paper was limited to 90 days.

In April, 1918, the Federal Reserve Board issued the following definition of agricultural paper:

> Horses and mules bought for farm work are purchased with several years' use in view, yet there can be no question that a note given by a farmer in payment of a pair of mules to be used in farm work, maturing within six months, is eligible as agricultural paper. Where tractors are used to supplement the work of horses or mules or are used altogether instead of these animals, it seems to the board that notes given by farmers for the purchase of tractors, and maturing within six months, should be admitted to discount as agricultural paper * * *.

At an earlier date, 1916, the board ruled as follows with regard to agricultural implements:

> That it was a very close question whether agricultural implements are to be considered as permanent improvements or as part of the cost of operation, but as ground for liberality it must be considered that a machine of this kind is not of a permanent character. It wears out rapidly, and in most cases has to be replaced within a comparatively short time, so that it may be assumed that a certain amount of money would be spent annually and regularly for the purchase and replacement of machinery of this kind.

Again, in August, 1918, we find the eligibility of agricultural paper extended, as follows:

> Cases may arise in the reclamation of swamp lands where such lands could not be treated as farm land until expensive drainage systems have been installed. In such case there is doubt of the eligibility of the notes, the proceeds of which are used for this purpose. Where, however, the land drained is already in use as farm land, the draining may be treated as incidental to the cultivation of the land, and notes given for such purpose may be rediscounted as agricultural paper.

And again with regard to implement paper in December, 1915:

> The nature of the bill, the name of the acceptor, and the name of the drawer would probably indicate that a farmer was the purchaser and an implement dealer the seller of the goods. However, the purchasing member bank will have to satisfy itself in some satisfactory way that the bill is substantially of an agricultural character. A simple memorandum attached to the bill, stating that the bill was drawn in payment of agricultural implements, signed either by the acceptor or the drawer, would probably be considered sufficient evidence by the member bank and the Federal reserve bank.

Again in October, 1915, the board ruled:

> The committee entertained the view that warehouse receipts for cotton, grain, and other staple nonperishable agricultural products of a readily marketable character, form an excellent basis for bank loans.

And in October, 1917:

> Potatoes, properly graded and packed and stored in a weatherproof and responsible warehouse, as evidence by its receipt, would undoubtedly constitute a readily marketable, nonperishable staple within the meaning of the regulation.

Other bulletins were issued from time to time. I have called attention to a few of them to indicate a general disposition on the part of the board to extend the rediscount privilege to agricultural paper with a maturity of six months in every instance where it could be done with reasonable safety to the rediscounting bank.

It has been claimed and persistently urged that it was during the deflation in 1920 and 1921 that the board evidenced its hostility toward agricultural paper at the very time when it should have been more liberal than in the earlier years. In the bulletin issued by the Federal Reserve Board in August, 1921, we find that on July 9, 1920:

> The total bills on hand at all Federal reserve banks amounted to $2,934,184,000. On July 6, 1921, this total amounted to $1,832,499,000, a decrease of $1,101,685,000 * * *. The total of agricultural, commercial, and live-stock paper on hand, rediscounted for member banks, on July 6, 1921, was $1,126,968,000 as against a total of $1,265,243,000 on July 9, 1920, a decrease of only $138,257,000, which is more than accounted for by the decrease in the holdings of paper of this kind by the Federal Reserve Banks of Boston, New York, and Chicago.

Commenting upon these figures the governor of the board said:

> The bank liquidation which has taken place has been mainly in financial and industrial centers, and the figures do not indicate that there has during the past 12 months been any decrease in Federal reserve accommodations to banks in the agricultural and live-stock districts, but on the contrary there has been a considerable increase.

In this connection it should be borne in mind that the decline in the price of farm products was more rapid than the reduction of credits. As there was no decline in the total of agricultural paper held in the nine agricultural regions, it must follow that reserve funds in these districts were increased for the benefit of agriculture.

The claim that the Federal reserve banks or the member banks discriminated against loans to rural districts during the inflation period would seem to be without foundation. The committee of agricultural inquiry appointed early in 1921 thoroughly investigated this subject, and in Part II of their report we find the following summary:

1. That the expansion of bank loans in rural districts during the period of inflation ending June, 1920, was relatively greater than in the industrial sections taken as a whole.
2. That the action of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks during the 15 months preceding April 28, 1921, did not produce a greater curtailment of bank loans in the rural districts than in the financial and industrial sections.
3. Credit was not absorbed by the financial centers at the expense of rural communities for the purpose of speculative activities.
4. That the pressure of the forces of liquidation and depression in the agricultural sections was reflected in a reduction of deposits. This reduction of deposits, particularly demand deposits, was relatively larger in the agricultural and semiagricultural counties in the United States than in the industrial counties.

The Senate members of this committee were Messrs. LENROOT, of Wisconsin; CAPPER, of Kansas; MCNARY, of Oregon; ROBINSON, of Arkansas; HARRISON, of Mississippi. The members for House were Messrs. ANDERSON, of Minnesota; MILLS, of New York; FUNK, of Illinois; SUMNERS, of Texas; TEN EYCK, of New York. We find in the commission many members of the agricultural bloc, and all of them were men of the highest character, and the fact that they were unanimous in reaching the conclusions which I have just quoted ought to silence for all time the claim that there was any intentional effort on the part of any public or banking official to discriminate against loans sought by the agricultural interests.

With regard to the claim that the cotton growers of the South were discriminated against by the Federal reserve banks, I want to call attention to a circular published by the Richmond bank under date of July 23, 1921, a portion of which I quote:

The Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond has never applied the progressive rate. The discount rate of this bank has never been above 6 per cent.

Criticisms of the credit policy of the Federal reserve banks are still current, and even rampant. They are possibly most frequent in the South, and more liberal credit has been urged for southern agricultural interests. The five reserve banks in the Cotton States are lending their members $457,000,000, which is 26 per cent of the loans of the entire reserve system. The total loans of these five reserve banks to their members exceed their reserve deposits by $192,000,000, whereas the reserve deposits of the other seven reserve banks exceed their loans by $118,000,000.

If loans to farmers are restricted, it is not done by the reserve banks, nor is it the result of any policy adopted by the reserve banks. The act and the regulations of the board define the character and terms of paper which may be taken by reserve banks. They lend the money to their members, and they discount the classes of eligible paper offered by their members. The greater portion of the money loaned in this district is tied up with agriculture in one way or another.

The two cotton States of this district are North and South Carolina. Virginia grows very little cotton. This bank is lending to members in North Carolina $25,000,000, which is 411.7 per cent of their reserve deposits. It is lending to South Carolina members $21,000,000, which is 525.5 per cent of their reserve deposits. In addition to this, the member banks of these two States are borrowing $13,000,000 from other banks, which obtain the funds from the Federal reserve banks. Measure this by the situation with the seven reserve banks outside of the cotton States, which have reserve deposits exceeding their loans by $118,000,000.

The volume of loans to these two cotton States, $46,000,000, directly by the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond and $13,000,000 from other banks, can be further gauged by the statement that it is more than half the maximum amount which all the national banks of the country ever borrowed at any one time prior to 1914, or before the Federal reserve banks were established. This bank is lending to some of its member banks ten to fifteen times the amount of their reserve deposits in order to meet their apparent necessities.

Under the conditions hereinbefore set forth, and under the terms of the Federal reserve act and the regulations of the board, the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond will make further advances for making and gathering the growing crop and will discount for its members eligible paper secured by warehouse receipts for new cotton at 80 per cent of the market value at the time loans are made, to be kept good, and will discount acceptable trade acceptances of mills for cotton purchased and intended for consumption and bankers' acceptances based on new cotton and made under the regulations.

The reserve banks of the cotton States can adequately provide for the gathering and orderly marketing of the new crop with the full cooperation of all member banks. To make this aid thoroughly effective, member banks will be compelled to take measures to provide for the small cotton producer, both in completing his crop and in order that he may not suffer by having to sell his cotton immediately upon gathering it should there not be a satisfactory market at the time. The proceeds of such advances on new cotton should be used to liquidate current indebtedness where possible in order to give vitality to credit. It should be obvious that business can not move and be kept moving unless cotton is sold as the market will take it.

I also quote from circular letter published by the Federal Reserve Board, July 20, 1921:

In view of the vital importance of the problems incident to the harvesting and marketing of the coming cotton crop, the Federal Reserve Board to-day held a conference with the governors of the Federal Reserve Banks of Richmond, Atlanta, St. Louis, Kansas City, and Dallas, the banks located in or brought in closest touch with the member banks in the cotton States, for the purpose of reviewing the credit situation in these States and determining what further credit will be needed to facilitate the harvesting and orderly marketing of this crop.

At the present time the five reserve banks in question are lending to their members $457,000,000, or more than 26 per cent of the loans of the entire system, the Richmond bank borrowing from other reserve banks $20,000,000, and the Dallas bank borrowing $16,000,000 for that purpose. The total loans of these five reserve banks to their members exceed their reserve deposits by $192,000,000, whereas the reserve deposits of the other seven reserve banks exceed their loans to their members by $118,000,000.

The Federal Reserve Board and the governors of the Federal reserve banks announce that the Federal reserve banks, in addition to credits already extended, are able and stand ready to extend further credit for the purpose of harvesting and marketing the coming crop in whatever amount may legitimately be required, either directly to their member banks or under a ruling now issued by the Federal Reserve Board, indirectly to nonmember banks acting through the agency and with the indorsement of a member bank. These loans will be made by the Federal reserve banks upon notes, drafts, and bills of exchange issued or drawn in accordance with the terms of the Federal reserve act and the regulations of the Federal Reserve Board for the harvesting and orderly marketing of the coming cotton crop.

In order, however, that these rediscount facilities of the Federal reserve banks may be made fully effective it will be necessary that member banks in the cotton States place their loaning facilities freely at the disposal of cotton producers and dealers in their respective localities with the knowledge and assurance that the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks recognize the urgency of rendering all proper assistance to these important interests during such abnormal times.

Mr. Meyer, managing director of the War Finance Corporation, who attended the conference, reviewed the activities of the War Finance Corporation in making loans for financing cotton for immediate and future export. Governor Strong, of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, and representatives of certain New York member banks were also invited to the conference to discuss the necessity or advisability of having various commercial banks through the country establish a fund for the purpose of making loans upon cotton. In view of the conclusions reached by the conference as to the ability of the Federal reserve banks effectively to take care of all of the legitimate requirements of the cotton interests, it was felt that the establishment of such a fund at this time is neither necessary nor advisable.

Mr. President, we all know and we ought to bear in mind at this time that the drop in prices in 1920 was world-wide. Moreover, it was foreseen and warnings of the impending and inevitable drop in prices were abundant and frequent. Every business man of experience and sound judgment knew that prices were becoming unbearable; that the war level of prices could not and ought not to be maintained, and that the persistent attempt on the part of speculators to push them higher and higher would end precisely as it did end. I am not saying that there were no instances where further extensions of credit would have been beneficial to certain interests. The point that I want to make clear is that there was no concerted action, no conspiracy, to deprive the rural sections of the country of credit that existing conditions and circumstances would warrant. To illustrate, the first large interest to feel the decline was the live-stock interest; and why? The exports of meat products from the United States in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, aggregated 3,338,000,000 pounds, but in the year ending June 30, 1920, they dropped to 2,048,000,000 pounds, and in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, our meat exports declined to 823,000,000 pounds. This enormous falling off in our exports of meat products immediately affected live-stock values, and their decline in price was universal. Spring trade in general in 1920 was not satisfactory. Far-seeing merchants began to cut prices and cancel orders, yet in May wheat sold as high as $3.45 a bushel and as late as September it sold as high as $2.75 a bushel. Cotton sold in July, 1920, at 43.75 cents per pound. It was natural for the farmers to want top prices for their products; consequently they held them, hoping against hope that the decline was temporary and that prices would soon resume their upward rush.

I will say at this point that the present price of wheat is proportionately low; there is no question about that; but when we remember that, according to recent reports which have been received from the International Bureau of Agricultural Statistics, which is located at Rome, the production of wheat this year is estimated to be in excess of 650,000,000 bushels over normal years it is easy to see why the price of wheat is not so high as it should be, compared with that of other products.

The farmers at the beginning of the deflation period sought credits that would enable them to hold their products, and the banks, anxious to do business at a profit, were tempted in many instances to renew loans when they should have advised their customers of the impending storm and encouraged them to liquidate and sell at prices that were very much higher than the ones they were ultimately compelled to take. This is demonstrated by the fact that during the period when the most serious credit strain occurred loans by the reserve banks to member banks in the agricultural sections increased 57 per cent, in the semiagricultural sections these loans decreased 2 per cent, while in the industrial communities they decreased 29 per cent.

In view of the fact that there was so much complaint during the deflation period that the credit systems of the country were not accommodating the agricultural interests as they should, I think that statement is very important in the consideration of the subject.

It seems to me that Congress at this time should be careful to avoid as far as possible the establishment of credit facilities that will invite the farmers of the country to put on more sail and get farther and farther from shore when the next deflation storm approaches. Business depression and unemployment have been far more serious in other countries than in the United States. Everywhere enormous losses have been suffered in all industrial activities, all due to the paralysis and disorganization of industry due to the war and the consequent issue of unlimited credit.

Our purpose should be to insure to the agricultural interests reasonable credits at reasonable rates of interest, to the end that agricultural conditions may be improved, that the cost of production may be reduced by more scientific processes. It is important that we encourage and in every way assist the farmers to adopt cooperative methods for the economical control and distribution of their products. We should not invite them to indulge in the hope that regardless of the methods which they may pursue they will be provided with funds that will enable them to hold their crops until they can sell them at a profit.

The attempts of the Brazilian Government to peg the price of coffee furnishes a lesson which it would be well for us to heed. A few years ago the Government of Brazil conceived the idea that it would be a good plan to valorize the price of coffee with money taken from the public treasury. The surplus of coffee increased so rapidly and required so much money that Brazil was tempted to start her printing presses to furnish the cash. She was warned not to do this by the coffee buyers in different parts of the world, and I noticed in the press the other day that large importers of coffee in the United States were considerably worried over the fact that coffee was coming into this country from sources outside of Brazil in such large quantities that it was likely to break the back of the Brazilian monopoly and cost the American importers dearly on their outstanding contracts.

Credit conditions in this country at the present time are on a sound basis. I would not minimize the fact that the farmers are having hard times in many sections, nor would I discourage extending relief; but the fact is that normal credit conditions have already been reached in many sections of the country. This is indicated in many ways. The national banks throughout the country are reporting very large increases in their deposits. It is reported that generally throughout the South frozen credits or loans are nearly wiped out. Nonmember banks have reduced their indebtedness 80 per cent in the last year. In Houston, Tex., deposits are in excess of $100,000,000, an amount never before equaled in the history of that city.

One of the leading exporters of cotton appeared before your committee and testified that Germany was now importing close to her normal pre-war consumption and that the purchasers were meeting their payments on time and without the least difficulty. This can be readily understood when we bear in mind that Germany sold nearly a billion dollars worth of marks to Americans when the price was far below par. It should also be borne in mind in this connection that foreign loans measured in dollars sold in this country in the four years from 1919 to 1922, amounted to $2,500,000,000. It is estimated that our purchases of American securities from foreign holders since 1914 amount to $3,000,000,000, and that we have advanced $3,000,000,000 on commercial credits.

During the inflation period the farmer was very certain that the rise in prices would be maintained. Statesmen, editors, and candidates assured the farmer that low prices had passed away for all time. Instead of investing his profits in safe securities he bought mining and oil stocks or increased his acreage.

I remember that in the winter of 1919 the former Senator from Iowa, Mr. Kenyon, introduced what he denominated a "blue sky law," which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. We had protracted hearings upon that bill, and my impression is that the very gentlemen who are now here urging credit legislation in the interest of the farmers appeared before our committee and testified that the farmers in the Middle West were buying, I think, at the rate of half a billion dollars a year, gold-mining stocks where there was no gold and oil wells where there was no oil, and that Congress should lose no time in coming to the rescue of those farmers in the Middle West who naturally, like everybody else, when they were making money wanted to make it a little faster, and who invested in spurious stocks. In every agricultural State land speculation forced prices to a point where increased taxes and capital investments rendered profits impossible. When the crash came the bankers were held responsible, but it is evident now that his fault, if any, lay in granting too liberal credits in many instances. Not being able to convince the farmer of the unwisdom and impossibility of further extensions, the banker laid the blame upon the Federal Reserve Board. In some sections both banker and farmer entirely lost sight of the real purpose and possibilities of the Federal reserve system as a system to meet emergencies and not to intensify and aggravate them. It was forgotten that the reserve banks served widely separated sections of widely divergent interests and that they were managed by directors chosen by entirely different groups of men. It did not follow that available credits in one district implied unfair discrimination. The record simply indicates more careful management in some districts than in others. The record also shows that security speculation was controlled much more easily than speculation in farms and their products.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. McLEAN. I will say to the Senator from Alabama that, while I do not like to be discourteous, I should like to finish my statement in a connected manner, and after that I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. Very well.

Mr. McLEAN. If there was a difference of opinion between the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve Board as to the wisdom of the policy of the Secretary of the Treasury in meeting the needs of the Government, I do not care to criticize either branch of the Government but merely to call attention to what was said and done by men responsible for the Treasury and the Federal reserve system. In March, 1921, Mr. R. C. Leffingwell, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, in an article printed in the American Economic Review, said:

> During the whole period of the war any attempt of the Federal Reserve Board to control credit through rates would have been futile. The Treasury would have had to meet any rate they made at home, and the Federal reserve bank rate could have no effect upon the international situation, because the international movement of goods, gold, and capital was controlled by foreign governments or our own for the purposes of the war. The adoption of a "dear money" policy during the war with a view to preventing inflation would have failed of that purpose unless it had been carried to such an extreme as to bring about such conditions in war time as exist to-day, in which case we should have lost the war and would have had to inflate afterwards in order to pay the indemnity which Germany would have imposed upon us.
> After the war was over in the fighting sense it went right on in the Treasury sense. We reached the peak of expenditures in the three months, November and December, 1918, and January, 1919. We spent $2,000,000,000 a month. That was as much as the first Liberty loan each month. Since armistice day this Government has paid out as much as before armistice day—twenty billions before and twenty billions after. The gross debt of the Government on armistice day was eighteen billions. Nine months later it was twenty-six and a half billions. While the Government debt was mounting thus, the same condition continued which had existed during the period of active warfare. It was no more practicable to exercise control of credit by the use of dear money than it had been before. Indeed, it was less practicable, because the enthusiasm, devotion, and self-reliance of the American people while war was on vanished overnight with the signing of the armistice. The bills did not get paid any easier, but a good deal harder, because the Germans had capitulated.
> Though something may be said for the view that in the latter part of 1919 there might have been a somewhat earlier and greater advance in rates on commercial paper and in the open-market buying rates for acceptances, my own judgment is that this is a question of detail rather than of substance, and that the effort to make money really dear before January, 1920, when the Government was first able to reduce its floating debt to manageable amounts and maturities, would have risked more than it could have hoped to gain.

Whether the position of the Secretary was right or wrong, an increase in the discount rate was impossible.

In April, 1919, we find the following warning in a bulletin issued by the Federal Reserve Board:

> Already some well-managed member banks are showing in their statements the extent to which they are in debt to Federal reserve banks. It has been the opinion of the board that the borrowing of member banks at Federal reserve banks might very easily be carried to excess, the loans being placed there primarily for the purpose of profit and not for any more general public or fundamental object. In a general letter to banks, issued on November 19 (1918), and referred to in the Federal Reserve Bulletin for December, the board took occasion to caution member banks which it was thought were in some danger of overdoing their rediscounting, that the purpose of such rediscount operations was not primarily that of assisting the member institutions which placed the rediscount to obtain the funds for further profitable operations, but was, rather, to be determined upon the basis of general banking advantage or upon that of relief for banks which found themselves hard pressed or were suffering from reductions in reserve account.

Bearing in mind that the highest discount rate at any time imposed by the Federal Reserve Board was 7 per cent, it must follow that unjustifiable discrimination, if any, must be laid at the door of the primary loaning bank, over which the Federal reserve banks have no control.

Mr. President, the fact is, the critics of the system failed to note that extensions of credit must come to a point where they can not be of general benefit. In other words, there comes a time when rising prices can not be offset by easy money.

I do not intend to engage in a discussion of the quantity theory of money. Professor Taussig says that other things being equal the theory is sound, but he adds that other things are never equal. It is unnecessary that we should agree as to whether rising prices created by the war demands necessitated the large increase in credits and currency, or whether it was the increase in the credits and currency that stimulated the demand. The fact is that there will always come a time when inflation must cease.

Late in the year 1919 it was very clear to the impartial observer that the increase in currency and credits had reached the limit of its beneficial effect upon the industrial and productive activities of the country. By December, 1921, the total reserves of the Federal reserve system were $2,999,200,000, which would authorize a Federal reserve note issue of $7,480,000,000. According to the comptroller's report for September, 1921, the net deposits of national banks aggregated $10,800,000,000. When we bear in mind in connection with this statement that $1 in gold or lawful money deposited by a country bank in a Federal reserve bank as reserve for its demand deposit would authorize that bank to lend $40 in deposit credits, we can see that the Federal reserve system, reposing as it does in the Federal Reserve Board the power to suspend altogether the gold-reserve requirement, contains seeds of inflation which, if permitted to germinate, would permit credit and currency conditions approximating those now prevailing in France.

Moreover, in any successful attempt to benefit the agricultural interests as a whole it must be borne in mind that these interests differ greatly in different sections of the country, and in the same sections of the country, for that matter. The poultry raiser wants everything cheap but chickens and eggs. The dairyman wants everything cheap but milk and butter. The fruit growers are not anxious to peg the price of anything but their products. The tobacco growers are not concerned in raising the price of wool or cotton or foods of any kind. The cotton grower will bear with great equanimity seasonable reductions in the price he has to pay for food and woolen raiment. The wheat grower wants his sugar cheap. The sugar-beet grower is not interested in boosting the price of wheat. The herdsman likewise is interested in looking out for number one. The potato growers have no special interest in keeping up the prices of other varieties of foods.

During the war the dairymen in my section of the country paid prices for hay and grain that were not reflected in the price they could obtain for their milk; and many of them were forced to dispose of their herds in 1918 and 1919, when the farmers of the West were very prosperous. In the Connecticut Valley are many well-managed dairy farms. I doubt if any of them made money during the war, or since the war, for that matter, owing to the increase in the cost of production. It is true that the price of milk has increased until the consumers complain, but at no time has the producer received a satisfactory portion of his dollar.

So, when we speak of the farmers, we must bear in mind that their interests are far from identical. They may all agree that the prosperity of one class depends upon the prosperity of all the other classes; but it therefore follows that Congress, in any endeavor which it may put forth to benefit the agricultural interests, must be exceedingly careful to legislate in the interest of all. We may admit that the prosperity of the agricultural interest as a whole is most vital to the prosperity of the Nation; we may admit that it must have access to adequate credits at reasonable rates of interests; but our efforts to help the farmer may cost more than they are worth if we establish unnecessary credit-distributing agencies. Every dollar expended in overhead charges, in clerk hire, in rents and furniture, every unnecessary loan, and every defaulted loan adds to the interest rate which the borrowers in general must pay.

There are too many credit merchants to-day, as there are too many meat markets and grocery stores. One-half the number of banks now in existence could easily and evenly distribute all the credits required to meet every legitimate demand. Already the banks in the East are realizing the economies and advantages of consolidation. Thirty thousand commercial banks means 625 banks for every State, a bank for every 3,500 inhabitants, a bank for every 800 families—enough to supply four times the credit needs with convenience and dispatch if they were properly coordinated, located, and administered. Setting up another chain of credit merchants involves an economic waste which should be avoided, if possible. Banks can not make money. They do not manufacture credits. The capital that goes into a new bank adds nothing to the total. It must be withdrawn from the supply already on hand.

What the farmer wants, and should have, is a just and fair portion of his own dollar—the dollar he wrings from the soil when blights and bugs and weather permit. The farmer must not only control and check the enemies which Mother Nature marshals for his entertainment and destruction, but he must control and protect his market from uneconomical manipulations as well as from the onslaughts of the engrosser and forestaller. He must manage somehow, either by reducing his cost of production or by the protection of his market, to get for his goods more than the cost of production.

It will be much more equitable and profitable for the consumer in the long run to pay a living price to the farmer; and certainly it will not help the farmer to provide credit facilities that will do nothing more than enable him to add to his debts and encourage him to continue to do business at a loss. When the farmers of the country learn the wisdom of organization and cooperation in the distribution of their goods they will find themselves on the high road to adequate and convenient credit accommodations.

The wisdom of this course has been abundantly demonstrated in many sections of the Union. Fruit-producing sections in California which a few years ago were bankrupt are now the richest in the world. The tobacco growers in the Connecticut Valley have for years sown without reaping to any great extent. I would not belittle the undeserved and dire calamities that have befallen the farmers in other sections of the country, but I commend the searchers for agricultural tragedy to the record of losses sustained by my neighbors, who, owing to western competition in the production of foodstuffs and clothing fabrics, have been compelled to put their capital into expensive tobacco sheds and lands.

They have lived in constant dread and at the mercy of hailstorms, wildfire, droughts, floods, frosts, worms, and, worst of all, the New York buyers, who have consistently combined to bear prices to starvation levels. They have remained in the business because they could not get out, just as the wheat grower in North Dakota finds himself chained to his job, and the cotton grower of the South finds himself in one-crop bondage from which he can not afford to buy his release.

The Connecticut tobacco growers can produce as fine cigar wrappers as are grown anywhere in the world, and once in a while they make good money. Most of them have dairies and a few hens and pigs, a most valuable possession during the lean years, and one that I would recommend to the farmers in the Northwest and in the South. This year the tobacco growers of the Connecticut Valley made up their minds that they would at least attempt to protect the market for their crop if they were fortunate enough to grow one, and under wise leadership they have formed a cooperative marketing association which has been joined by 85 per cent of the growers up to date. They have borrowed $8,000,000, at a reasonable rate, with which to cure and market their crop in an economical and orderly manner; and if they can retain their confidence in themselves, and give their experiment a fair trial, each tobacco grower will get a fair share of the dollars to which he is entitled.

Men who have exhausted this subject in theory and in experiment agree that organization and cooperation in economical, self-controlled units, wisely regulated and encouraged by State legislatures, which are close to conditions and necessities, are the first things to be considered by the farmer who would reduce the cost of production and increase his profit, and at the same time provide the American people with food and raiment at reasonable prices.

The question for us to answer now is, What can Congress do that will hasten and not retard the farmer in his effort to surmount untoward conditions which can be controlled? As I have already pointed out, the Federal reserve system can furnish all the credits required to finance the sale and distribution of goods. The purpose of its framers was to provide a method for conserving and mobilizing the reserves of its member banks, so that they might always be kept fluid and ready to meet every legitimate demand for currency and every legitimate demand for the distribution of sound credits, and experience has demonstrated that the system under sympathetic management can easily cross the dead line and encourage undue expansion.

Later on Congress created the Federal farm loan system, for which the initial capital was taken out of the Treasury of the United States. Congress did this because the farmers in many sections of the country were unable to secure legitimate and necessary loans secured by farm lands at reasonable rates of interest. At the time the bill was drafted it was admitted that the rate of interest on farm-mortgage loans exceeded 6 per cent in 36 States, and was as high as 10, and perhaps 12, per cent in some States. The complaint of the farmer was confined to his inability to get a loan on his farm at reasonable rates. Congress properly took the view that the farmer owning a small farm was entitled to a loan at reasonable rates of interest. Congress desired to protect and encourage individual ownership of farms, and it realized that in very many instances men desiring to engage in farming could not purchase farms and would not purchase farms or operate farms unless they could obtain a long-time loan and carry it at a reasonable rate of interest. With this in view the act provided for loans running from 5 to 40 years. The plan permitted the farmer to control the length of time which the loan should run.

Under the amortization privilege embodied in the act, the farmer who borrowed one thousand at 5½ per cent and on a 1 per cent amortization pays $65 a year in semiannual payments of $32.50 each until the loan is discharged. This is 6½ per cent on the sum borrowed, but it not only pays the interest but discharges the entire loan itself within 34½ years. The first payment is $27.50 in interest and $5 on the principal. The next payment is figured at 5½ per cent on the reduced amount of principal, $995, and will be applied as follows: $27.36 for interest and $5.14 on the principal. He continues to make payments of $32.50 every six months, but the interest payment is constantly growing smaller and the payment on the principal steadily growing larger. At the end of 34½ years he pays $1.71 interest and $30.79 on the principal and his farm is free from debt. The advantages to the farmer are apparent. He has no fear of foreclosure, and if he keeps up his semiannual amortization payment his entire mortgage will be liquidated when it comes due.

The Farm Loan Board has defined an actual farmer as follows: "One who conducts the farm and directs its entire operation, cultivating the same with his own hands or by means of hired labor." Loans may be made to provide for the purchase of land for agricultural purposes, to provide for the purchase of equipment, fertilizers, and live stock necessary for the reasonable operation of the mortgaged farm—the term "equipment" to be defined by the Federal Farm Loan Board—also to provide buildings and for the improvement of farm lands—the term "improvement" to be defined by the Federal Farm Loan Board—also to liquidate indebtedness of the owner of the land mortgaged incurred for agricultural purposes or incurred prior to the organization of the first farm-loan association established in and for the county in which the land is situated.

The Farm Loan Board has ruled that the term "equipment" shall include all improvements necessary to facilitate the operation of the farm, such as teams, machinery, tools, and the like. The term "improvement" has been defined to include anything in the form of a beneficial structure, or any useful, permanent, physical change tending to increase the productive value of the farm, such as clearing lands of timber, tiling, draining, fencing, and building. The board has ruled that all land included in the mortgage need not be cultivated, and that one purpose for which money may be borrowed is to prepare land for cultivation, and a reasonable amount of pasture land in connection with a farm is desirable. It has also ruled that loans may be made on lands which are primarily agricultural lands on which, however, there are leases carrying the right to remove oil, gas, or other minerals, provided that the extent to which such use may interfere with the land for agricultural purposes be taken into consideration. In such cases the land banks are to require the borrower to include in his mortgage his rights under such lease, and the proceeds therefrom shall be applied to the payment of the mortgage, and where lands are subject to annual charges for drainage this charge may be regarded as of the same nature as a municipal or school-district tax, which do not prevent the making of a loan on such land but must be taken into account in appraising its value. Orchard lands and lands under irrigation or drainage projects have been considered with special favor by the Farm Loan Board.

While the value of orchards consists largely in the trees and not in the land, and the trees are not a permanent insurable improvement in that they are subject to utter destruction by either freezing or neglect, the board ruled that orchards may be regarded as permanent improvements and may be taken into consideration as enhancing the general value of the land and in determining its productive value. The expense of the land banks consists largely in appraisements of land and examination of titles. The system was created not for the purpose of financing the large farms nor for the purpose of enabling capitalists to take advantage of the small farmer in periods of depression and force him from his home. The act was created for the purpose of protecting and increasing the number of small farmers, who are the real mainstay of agriculture. But to the small farmer and to the man who wants to leave his employment in a mercantile establishment and secure a small farm the act offers every advantage and has already demonstrated its usefulness. The system is designed for the bona fide operator and not the speculator in land. To this end the act provides that the capital stock should be subscribed by the borrowing farmer and not by the outside investing public.

But, Mr. President, I realize that both of these measures, the Federal reserve act and the Federal farm loan act, were put into operation before we entered the war. During the war, during the period of rising prices, the farmers had no trouble in securing credits or a profitable market. It was when prices began to drop that the farmer's troubles began.

Urgent appeals for assistance were presented to Congress, and in August, 1921, Congress revived the War Finance Corporation, which placed almost unlimited Government credit in the hands of patriotic and sympathetic management for the purpose of assisting agriculture to carry the burdens of deflation. The report of the manager in chief, recently published, gives a detailed account of timely assistance rendered to the food, cotton, and wool producers of the country. During a large portion of the deflation period the loans authorized averaged more than $2,000,000 a day.

I remember that Mr. Meyer appeared before the committee and testified that in the State of North Dakota the War Finance Corporation made loans to 600 banks, and those 600 banks took the notes of 26,000 farmers of North Dakota as security for those loans, showing that Congress has been far from negligent in its efforts to extend to the farmer every possible advantage in the way of legitimate credits.

Up to November 30, 1922, the corporation approved advances totaling $433,447,000 in 37 States—$182,859,000 to 4,400 banking institutions, $77,761,000 to 113 live-stock loan companies, and $172,827,000 to 32 cooperative-marketing associations. The live-stock loans in the West amounted to $90 001,000; on cotton, $81,848,000; on grain in the West and Northwest, $36,790,000; on peanuts in Virginia, $2,045,000; on tobacco in Kentucky, Indiana, and Ohio, $40,000,000; on rice, $10,250,000; on sugar beets, $11,438,000; and for general agricultural purposes, $159,180,000. Of the amounts authorized and approved, $265,598,000 had been actually advanced by November 30, 1922—$168,258,000 to banking institutions, $73,452,000 to live-stock companies, and $28,888,000 to cooperative-marketing associations. Repayments received by the corporation to November 30, 1922, on account of these loans totaled $109,938,000, of which $71,243,000 was repaid by the banks, $24,129,000 by live-stock companies, and $14,566,000 by cooperative-marketing associations, leaving a balance outstanding of $155,660 000. Of this balance $97,016,000 is due from the banks, $49,323,000 from live-stock loan companies, and $9,321,000 from the cooperative-marketing associations.

In addition to these loans the War Finance Corporation, after the time it resumed operations in January, 1921, authorized advances amounting to $53,374,000 for the purpose of financing exports. Thirty-eight million three hundred and seventy-nine thousand dollars of this went to the banks, $9,733,000 to exporters, and $5,262,000 to cooperative-marketing associations. Of the total amount authorized for export purposes, $5,778,000 represented advances on grain, $3,246,000 on tobacco, $35,759,000 on cotton, $3,120,000 on other agricultural products, and $5,471,000 on manufactured commodities. On November 30, 1922, $38,654,000 had been actually advanced—$28,469,000 to the banks, $7,547,000 to exporters, and $2,638,000 to cooperative-marketing associations. Repayments received by the corporation to November 30, 1922, from the export loans totaled $36,594,000. Of this $28,308,000 was returned by the banks, $5,648,000 by the exporters, and $2,600,000 by the cooperative-marketing associations, leaving a balance outstanding of $2,060,000. All of the export advances made by the corporation to cooperative-marketing associations have been repaid in full. Of the loans made under the war powers of the corporation and its export authority prior to the suspension of its activities in May, 1920, there was outstanding on November 30, 1922, $27,650,187, a total of $83,496,000 having been repaid since the corporation resumed operations in January, 1921. At the close of business in 1922 the corporation had outstanding on loans a total of $185,370,000.

The report referred to contains some very interesting conclusions as to the stimulating and helpful effect of the corporation's activities upon credit conditions in general, portions of which I quote:

In January of last year (1922) the effect of the corporation's activities began to be felt throughout the country. Conditions took a turn for the better and a progressive improvement set it. The corporation's loans strengthened the banking situation in the country districts and relieved the necessity of forced liquidation. They put the banks in position to carry their farmer customers for a longer period and to make new advances, and were a vital factor in bringing about a marked improvement in the whole economic situation. They not only helped the borrowing institutions and their farmer customers; they had a much more far-reaching effect upon the banks to which the corporation made no loans at all. In places where some banks were weak and some were strong the inability of the weak banks to serve their communities was accomplished by an unwillingness on the part of the strong banks to function in a normally confident and courageous way. The longer term rediscounts offered by the War Finance Corporation to the overextended banks, the restoration of market values following relief from forced liquidation, and the removal of the danger spots encouraged the more normal functioning of the strong banks and the more liberal use of their resources.

The psychological aspects of the corporation's work were of even greater consequence than its loans. A disturbed state of mind produced by financial pressure; a combination of hopelessness and resentment over inability to pay debts from the proceeds of sales at prevailing prices; a sense of injustice; disappointment in the past and apparently hopeless outlook for the future were the salient psychological facts in the situation when the corporation began to function under the agricultural credits act.

The problem was twofold. It was necessary to furnish financial assistance quickly to large numbers of farmers and stockmen, but it was even more vital to replace despair with renewed hope and to change the inaction of a discouraged people to the energy of restored confidence.

Considering the vast sums that are required annually to finance our agricultural and live-stock industries, the loans of the War Finance Corporation may seem relatively small. But the money was directed to the weak spots in the situation and helped to stabilize markets and to restore that element which is so vital to all kinds of business—confidence. The very fact that the corporation was in existence and the knowledge that it had the funds and the powers necessary to meet the situation was effective. Even before its funds were made available in large amounts a psychological reaction took place and confidence began to return.

At the suggestion of the President, the managing director in March and April, 1922, made a survey of the conditions then prevailing in the agricultural and live-stock districts of the West. At the conclusion of the survey a full report, which was printed as a Senate document (No. 199) was submitted to the President. The report indicated that there had been a noteworthy improvement in the agricultural situation. The demoralization which existed in the fall of 1921 had been largely overcome.

The corn and hog raisers of the Middle West were marketing their products and getting a fair return for them. The sheep raisers were selling their wool and fat lambs at satisfactory prices. Those engaged in the breeding and fattening of cattle were in a better position because of increased ability to finance their business and the improved market for their stock. Credit conditions in the West had greatly improved. The banks generally were beginning to function in a more normal way, funds were accumulating in the western financial centers, and there was a considerable increase in the demand for farm mortgages on the part of private investors, savings banks, and similar institutions.

It was evident that new loan companies with fresh capital were urgently needed, and that these companies would be most effective if they were locally owned and managed. Beginning with Salt Lake City, Cheyenne, and Denver, and following later on with Fort Worth, Albuquerque, and other western live-stock centers—from Montana and Oregon to New Mexico and Texas—the corporation succeeded in getting local bankers, business men, farmers, and stockmen to organize new loan companies, each with substantial capital, through which it could make live-stock loans promptly and on a large scale. At the time of the last annual report a number of these companies had been formed and were functioning helpfully. Since then the number has increased, and now their combined capital greatly exceeds the capital invested in all the live-stock loan companies that existed prior to October 1, 1921. And whereas the capital of the former companies was concentrated in a few places, principally in Chicago, Kansas City, and other live-stock market centers, the new companies are largely owned and managed locally in the live-stock growing States. These institutions not only have played an important part in meeting the emergency needs of the live-stock industry but they will undoubtedly fill an important place in the permanent structure of live-stock financing.

Of the loans authorized on live stock, totaling $90,001,000, approximately $77,761,000 represents advances through loan companies and $12,240,000 through banking institutions. The greater part of the $77,761,000 was placed through the new companies.

It is impossible to estimate the full effect of the aid given by the corporation to the live-stock industry, because calamities that are averted can never be measured. It is generally recognized, however, that by providing, as it did, financing for more than 6,900,000 head of live stock, the corporation checked the demoralization in the industry, gave the stockmen a breathing spell, stabilized the market, and turned the tide away from disaster toward recovery and reconstruction.

In the midst of the worst depression that the cotton industry has suffered in many years it was through the cooperative-marketing associations that the War Finance Corporation developed plans for extending assistance to the industry on a comprehensive scale. In the summer of 1921, when cotton was difficult to market at around 8 cents a pound at country points and when business throughout the cotton belt was in a demoralized condition, the corporation made its first large loan to an association in Mississippi on 100,000 bales of cotton.

The cotton was classified by the association according to grade and staple and placed in bonded warehouses licensed under the United States warehouse act. The loan enabled the association not only to make advances to its members for their urgent financial needs but also to market the crop through a greater portion of the consuming year instead of forcing it on a demoralized market.

Within a week or 10 days other loans were authorized on a similar basis to cotton cooperatives in Oklahoma on 200,000 bales and in Texas on 300,000 bales. There immediately followed a radical change in the cotton situation. Confidence was restored, other avenues of credit were opened up, buyers began to resume purchases on a liberal scale, and more normal conditions, with regard to both prices and volume of business, ensued. The change was promptly reflected in improved general business throughout the South.

The success of these cotton cooperatives encouraged the spread of the movement, and many new associations have been organized during the past year for the handling of cotton, wheat, tobacco, rice, and other staple products.

During the season of 1921–22 the corporation authorized loans totaling $64,000,000 to 19 cooperative marketing associations in 15 States to assist in the orderly marketing of the products of their members. Of this amount only $19,198,000 was actually called for by the associations, although the entire amount was available to them. It developed as the season progressed that the local banks were able and willing to care for their needs to a greater extent than had been anticipated. The corporation's commitments not only helped to create confidence but obviously the local banks were more willing to furnish funds to the cooperatives when they knew that the funds could in turn be obtained from another source and repaid to the banks in case of need.

All the reports received by the corporation indicate that its loans to cooperative marketing associations were vital factors in creating confidence and in making it possible for the cooperatives to finance the greater part of their requirements through banking channels. Not only that, but the loans had a marked effect on the general economic situation in the districts in which they were made. That effect was well expressed in a report from one of the cooperatives, which reads in part as follows:

"When this money came into our section and began to be distributed, it had the effect of almost instantaneously arresting the downward tendency and the depression which had enveloped business and industry. A new note of optimism, the beginning of restored confidence, was born, and its light has steadily grown brighter from that day on down to the present, and to-day the growers are on their sure and certain way back to prosperity."

Under all the circumstances it seems to me that Congress can not be accused of neglecting its duty to the farmer. It is easy to speculate as to what would have happened if the member banks had been more liberal in their renewals and advances in 1920 and 1921. It is easy to speculate as to what would have happened if the loan limit on farms had been increased to $25,000.

But I must insist that Congress was not to blame for the withholding of credits by member banks, and Congress was not to blame for restricting loans on farms to $10,000, as this was done at the request of those who at the time represented and spoke for the farmers—and wisely so, in my judgment. It is now claimed that the individual loans on farm lands should be increased to $25,000, owing to the very great increase in the value of farm land; and while there is force to this view, there is still a wide difference of opinion as to whether the increase to $25,000 will be of benefit to the small farmer; and this brings me to a point where I must say a few things which I think ought to be said when we attempt to establish permanent machinery for the advancement of what are called intermediate credit—that is, credit that will bridge the gulf between the accommodations provided by the Federal reserve system and the Federal Farm Loan Bureau.

Both of these credit institutions were organized before the war came on, and they promised fully to meet the needs of agriculture. It is my firm conviction that but for the war the Federal reserve system and the Federal farm loan system would have covered the field of wise and necessary credit accommodations. But the war came on, and everybody turned to the land as the primary source of the forces that would insure ultimate victory. Everybody who could engaged in farming. The man without a hoe was the exception. Everybody who could get control of a square rod of the surface of the earth planted it, and everybody who had been in the habit of cultivating acres cultivated more acres. Wheat was grown in Connecticut in considerable quantities for the first time in 70 years. The flower gardens were turned into vegetable producers. The man who did not plant his back yard to potatoes and his front yard to beans was put down as pro-German and his antecedents investigated. We must feed ourselves and our allies or the worst might happen. Our soldiers must not only have wholesome food in abundance but they must have woolen uniforms and sound and dry footgear. The treasuries of the world bid against each other for war supplies. The sudden demand for goods at any price was world-wide. Credit expansion was made easy by rapid increases in values. The price of breeding stock grew like Jonah's gourd. Every profiteer was a patriot and every patriot was a profiteer. Everybody who could not get land started a shop, a meat market, or a grocery store. Everybody who had a factory increased its size, and on the very top of this world wave of rising values rode the land of the farmers.

The census of 1920 shows that the number of farms in the United States in 1910 was 6,361,502; in 1920 it was 6,448,343, an increase of but 86,841. The total value of farms in the United States in 1910 was $34,801,125,697; in 1920 their total value was $66,316,002,602, an increase of $31,514,876,905.

The record of the census, which is probably below rather than above market values, shows that the value of the unearned increment in farm lands during the war increased rapidly and kept pace with the increase in other kinds of property. More water was pumped into our farms during this period than was pumped into the railroads since the first rail was laid. Noah's inundation was an April sprinkle compared with the inflation flood that covered the principal agricultural areas of the United States in 1919 and 1920. Every farmer built an ark of his own, and at the first sign of receding water he fell to his knees and prayed for more rain and the utter damnation of the Federal Reserve Board. The latter portion of his invocation was answered in a large measure, but the rain did not continue to his satisfaction.

I know, because I was one of them. I was convinced that it was my patriotic duty to buy sheep. I conceived the idea that if I bought another man's flock of sheep I doubled the number; and I paid $25 and $26 a head for ordinary sheep, because I wanted the soldier to be able to wear woolen clothing. Two years later I sold those sheep for $10 a head, and the man to whom I sold them sold them for $8, and he lost money.

What might have happened if a different course had been followed by the banks of the country nobody will ever know. But we know that it is still raining money in Germany and Russia, and we know the results, and from their experience we safely may conclude that inflation floods may do more harm than good if carried to excess. Apparently what the farmers now want and expect Congress to invent and apply is a banking machine of mechanical accuracy, a sort of automatic credit sprinkler, possessed of prophetic vision and ultimate wisdom, that will open and shut the valves of credit entirely free from the errors and desires of human agencies, until "peace shall come as a river and glory as a flowing stream." It is my opinion that this can not be done, and it can not be done because our credit machine will be run by men. Undue credit and currency expansion is always the result of overconfidence and lack of experience in the individual and ignorance of economic and natural laws, over which Congress has no control. As the late Thomas B. Reed once remarked, "Good and bad times, rising and falling prices, have alternated since the founding of the pyramids," and he might have added that they will continue to alternate as long as prices are paid for goods. Variety in prices is the romance of trade, and the possible profit to be gained is the mainspring of commerce. Remove the possibility of gain and you remove the incentive to produce and distribute. It is the promise of unusual profits that cuts costs, raises wages, and in the end reduces prices, and the individual who is making money on his own initiative will seldom concede that the price of his product is too high until it is too late to save him from the natural consequences of his error. The best that Congress can do is to fix a rule which, if intelligently obeyed by banker and borrower, will prevent disastrous extremes such as now prevail in many of the large nations of Europe. But any law which confers upon an administrative officer discretion broad enough to secure the benefits desired will also permit dangerous abuses in ignorant, unskilled, or dishonest hands, and there is no business so easily disturbed, no business which requires more careful management, than that of the banker. He is handling other people's money, which he must return to its owners on demand, and if true to his trust there are times when he must act with exceeding caution. Moreover, the man who by thrift and industry saves more than he spends and puts his surplus in a bank for safe-keeping is entitled to as much consideration as the man who borrows it.

The war came and went. During the first few months after its close there were symptoms of returning sanity in the industrial world. Prices stopped rising for a brief period. Uncertainty as to the future advised caution, but the vast nominal increase in capital values and the purchasing power of the people and the glorious victory won by our soldiers soon allayed all doubt of our future, and the upward rush of prices was resumed until the summer of 1920, when a consumers' strike threatened disaster to the producers. The presidential campaign was in full swing. Statesmen in the Senate demanded that the cost of living be reduced; price reducing resolutions were the order of the day. Statesmen outside of the Senate were careful to exempt home-grown products from the high-price blacklist. Indeed, it was reported that in the South statesmen promised 50 cents a pound for cotton; in the West $4 a bushel for wheat; in the North and East generalizations were more necessary, but no doubt was left in the mind of the voter as to the ability of Congress to perform miracles. There was nothing new in this method of tilting for party success.

The leaders of both parties have always promised the impossible. The ins fail to bring millennial conditions and the outs are given a chance. Without much regard to the merit or the achievement of things possible, the pendulum swings from one party to the other until the disappointed citizen sees in "insurgency" the only hope of electing men to office who can make money out of moonbeams and philanthropists out of profiteers. The ardent, earnest, and virtuous progressive gets along first rate until he is elected in numbers sufficient to get control of the Government, when he in turn must cross the dead line and be covered by his own avalanche or he must join the ranks of the hard-boiled reactionary enemies of the people. I am not saying that there is no choice in men and parties, but I do say that the ultimate and perfected self-government begins and ends with the good behavior of the individual, and that self-reliance is at the foundation of all material and moral progress. Mass prejudice and class cupidity, if they continue to strive to get even with each other by sifting ignorance through a ballot box, can bring but one result, and I do not care whether the leadership is hard or soft boiled. When prices go too high they will start the other way and go too low until the producers of the country by cooperation apply the only possible remedy for these undesirable extremes. I realize that in war all rules must be broken temporarily, and I realize that the economic crisis and losses of the war did not reach a large number of our farmers until the summer of 1920. It is for this reason that I did not oppose sending the War Finance Corporation to the rescue of agriculture; it was for this reason that I did not oppose governmental attempts to regulate the price of agricultural products during the war. I will admit that prices were first boosted and then broken as the direct result of forces set in motion by the war and which were too much for human nature to resist. There was, in my opinion, no other excuse for the continued activities of the War Finance Corporation. As a permanent policy it is indefensible. Governmental price-fixing in times of peace has been tried by every nation in history, by all the older States of the Union, and without exception it has defeated its own purposes and brought ruin to the class it was intended to benefit. Fortunately, this governmental attempt to relieve the distress of certain agricultural interests with the aid of money taken in taxes from the pockets of the American people was in good hands. But if it results in new demands for like assistance in times of peace and these demands are granted as a permanent policy it will prove to be the worst investment the American farmer has ever made.

It is clear to me that the assistance rendered by the War Finance Corporation, taken in connection with the credit facilities provided by the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal farm loan act, to which should be added the Fordney-McCumber tariff rates, ought to silence forever all complaint that Congress has neglected the farmers. The danger in the premises is that Congress may be induced to enact legislation that will discriminate, if not destroy, the smaller individual farmers who constitute the backbone of the Nation, and by encouraging them to do business at a loss so add to their debts that they will fall an easy prey to the capitalistic landlord when the next period of low prices arrives.

The rapid increase in tenant farmers will not be checked by granting subsidies and special favors to land speculators and the owners of large commercial farms. Those who speak for the farmers insist that there are times when they should be able to borrow money for periods running from nine months to three years and that notes of nine months' maturity should be eligible for rediscount by the Federal reserve banks. If this extension should be granted and the notes could not be used as collateral for currency until within 90 days of maturity, every legitimate need would be met. If longer credit than this is required, the note should be renewed. Sound banking requires that the security for this class of paper should be examined and appraised once in six months at the outside. Any system that impeaches and disregards the experience of centuries in the granting of credits secured by chattels, the value of which may be impaired by improper care, will prove to be unwise as it is unnecessary. Surely the man who earns the money to be loaned should not be held responsible and suffer all the consequences of the misfortunes and lack of judgment in the borrower. I am willing to vote to amend the Federal farm loan act and increase the individual line of credit from $10,000 to $25,000, and I shall gladly support the pending bill, which encourages the formation of cooperative marketing associations, for it is my opinion that it is through this agency that the farmer will find ways and means to withstand the devices of the speculating middleman and prevent alternating gluts and scarcity, to the advantage of himself and the consumer.

Mr. President, the farmer must bear in mind that, while general overproduction is impossible, disproportionate production is easily brought about. I can remember a season in New England before the war when chickens brought 40 cents a pound and potatoes 20 cents a bushel. A 5-pound capon was worth as much as 10 bushels of potatoes. This lack of equilibrium is very difficult of regulation, and its seriousness can be modified only by intelligent cooperation. It can not be remedied by Congress. Any governmental attempt to peg the price of this year's surplus and hold that surplus for an orderly market must have coupled with it the power and the duty to limit and allot to the several farmers of the Nation their production quota. Can the imagination devise a more disastrous, a more unpopular, program than that involved in the creation of a Federal bureau clothed with the power and the duty to tell the farmers of America how many acres each may cultivate, and for what purpose, how many bushels and pounds of grain and meat, how many hens and pigs and cattle and horses each may own? Yet this would have to be done or the surplus of any given product would soon be so great that sales would be impossible.

The farmer should also bear in mind that one man to-day can cultivate double the acreage that he could before the days of the tractor; moreover, a surplus in foods is known by everybody and the price is affected accordingly. And let me repeat that the general lack of profit in agriculture is not confined to this country; it is universal. In Sweden, where direct war costs were entirely escaped and where everything is done by the Government to sustain and stimulate the agricultural interests, the farmers are worse off than in the United States. Yet, notwithstanding this fact, the war emphasized the vital importance of agriculture to all the leading nations of the earth and shook to its foundations the British idea of specialization in the division of labor—the idea that great producing units should be allocated to the nations of the earth in obedience to an alleged special fitness to make certain things.

Great Britain for years insisted that her prosperity lay in cotton spinning and weaving and in certain lines of cutlery, permitting other countries to feed her increasing millions. If the war taught England no other lesson, it taught her the vital necessity of diversified production. We are fast learning the seriousness of the transportation tax upon commerce, but we are not yet alive to the importance of saving the transportation tax by producing in every State as many of the basic necessities of life as natural limitations will permit. The farmers of the West complain of the railroad rates required to pay the cost of carrying their products to the East. The farmers and manufacturers in the East complain of the cost of bringing their raw materials from distant points. As long as the margin of profit due to the superior fertility of the soil in the West offsets the carriers' charge to the East, it was wise and economical for the eastern dairyman to have his corn raised in the West; and this same rule would apply to the production of all foods and fibers. But when the price of land becomes so high in the West and its fertility so low that taxes and other capital and production charges added to reasonable transportation rates bring the cost of production above that incurred in sections closer to the consumer, an economic waste is involved which is bound to be eliminated by more intensive cultivation of eastern lands, and the direct result of this process will be to depress still lower the price of meats and grains from the West. It follows that it is the freight rate and not the interest rate which concerns the farmer in sections far removed from consuming centers. Naturally, the first impulse of the farmer thus located is to denounce the railroads and demand a reduction of rates that will enable him to hold his customers; and the all-important question is, How can this be done in a way that will be of permanent benefit? I have not heard the voice of any member of the farm bloc demanding reductions in the wages of the railroad employees or of the men engaged in the manufacture of railway equipment or in the mining of coal. For the sake of the argument, let us assume that any material reduction of wages is out of the question for unmentionable reasons. We must look in some other direction. then, for our remedy. It has been persistently urged by the agricultural bloc that if the water were squeezed out of the capital of the railroads and the 6 per cent guaranty removed the desired end might be accomplished. In the first place there is no guaranty of 6 per cent. The Interstate Commerce Commission is authorized to permit the imposition of rates that will return 6 per cent for dividends and other specified purposes, but the Interstate Commerce Commission has not done this and will not do it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, may I call attention to the fact that that direction ceased on the 1st of March last?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; that is true. In the second place unless the roads under private management are permitted to earn a reasonable profit for their owners, provided always that they can earn it with reasonable charges, a gross injustice will be done to the owners, an injustice offensive to every sane notion of right. Moreover, such a proposal if sustained would render permanent, adequate, and safe transportation systems impossible for the simple reason that investors will not put their money into railroads for the sole and single purpose of losing it. But for the possibility of unusual profits the transportation facilities of the West would still be limited to buffalo trails and corduroy roads. How then can we expect that the certainty of unusual losses will do more than encourage a return to the anterailroad days? If lower freight rates are to be brought about by lower costs in construction, maintenance, and management the intelligent farmer will insist that the roads be left in the hands of those who can and will make good money for themselves by the invention and application of labor and cost saving devices and methods. Once the farmer conceives that the remedy for his ills lies in conceding to other men engaged in other activities the same degree of economic liberty that he claims for himself he can be accorded reasonable freight rates. If reasonable rates will not permit him to sell his goods at a profit he must look for help to some other plan than the destruction of the credit of the railroads.

Mr. President, in these scattered general observations I have tried briefly to call attention to some of the things that Congress has already done for the farmers, some of the things it may wisely do, and some of the things that Congress can not do, in my opinion, and which, if attempted, will not only discredit those immediately responsible but result in incalculable harm to the farmers themselves. I have called attention to the ease with which credit-distributing instrumentalities and the officials engaged in operating them may be brought into disrepute by honest and well intentioned men when prices are too high to suit the consumer or too low to suit the producer. I could amplify at great length the underlying principles at which I have merely hinted and which ultimately will govern the costs of production and transportation as well as the prices of foods and farm products, regardless of legislative action. Admitting, as I readily do, that the farmers need and should have additional facilities in the extension of what are denominated intermediate credits, I am very confident that this can best be done in ways that will encourage the farmer to help himself. In other words, I think our legislation should be framed with the purpose and the hope that it will enable the farmers to find in their own initiative and self-reliance a way to protect themselves and their markets with a minimum of interference on the part of Congress. It is with this thought in mind that I heartily favor the organization of cooperative marketing associations and the extension to these associations of necessary and reasonable credits at normal rates, as provided in the pending bill.

I shall not oppose the creation of new governmental credit-distributing agencies provided in the Lenroot bill, but I believe that they would be entirely unnecessary if the banks of the country already in existence would join the Federal reserve system and use their augmented lending power for the purpose of building up the communities which they were organized to accommodate. Such a course, in my opinion, would bring increased deposits to country banks and enable them to meet every legitimate demand. I believe that the plan embodied in the pending bill which extends the life of the War Finance Corporation for another year, is by far the wisest and will prove to be the most efficient and economical method of all. If the farmers of the country insist upon taking any portion of the capital which they require out of the Public Treasury as a fixed and permanent and direct subsidy, it will not be long before similar demands will be made by other classes and interests of equal force and momentum, if not of equal merit.

I think the American people as a whole will justify our effort to carry the farmer by the war crisis, even to the extent of putting the credit of the Government at his command temporarily.

I hope, however, that we may give the farmer an opportunity to employ sound and safe and, above all, the most economical method of securing the largest possible share of his own dollar before we invite him to try experiments in paternalism that can have but one result. It has been said that the average man learns from his individual personal experience only, but that the wise man learns from the experience of others. If the American farmer would acquire wisdom from the experience of others, let him study the fate of his neighbors in Canada, where there is a branch bank at every crossroad. Let him inquire into the cause of the present exodus of Canadian farmers to the United States, and he will be fully satisfied, I think, that what the American farmer needs is a larger market and not a larger mortgage. If he will carefully study the causes of crises and depressions he will learn that what he needs today is an increase in the number and purchasing power of his customers rather than an increase in the number of his promissory notes; and the farmers of the West will learn that their prosperity will lie in the reduction of the cost of reaching their customers rather than in the reduction of the rate of interest they may be called upon to pay for borrowed money. Europe, including Russia, can easily produce a surplus of foods and undoubtedly will produce such a surplus in the near future. With scientific farming there is not a State in the Union that can not feed her population. A one-crop or a one-product State, whether it be wheat or cotton or clocks or jackknives, must expect trouble when the transportation cost gives the advantage to a competitor nearer the point of consumption. The struggle of the great West as she exhausts the fertility of her soil will be precisely similar to the struggle that faced the East 75 years ago, when the virgin soil of the West rendered it impossible for the farmers of the East to compete in the production of grains and meats. Instead of bringing under cultivation more acres at vast expense for the production of foods that can not be sold for enough to pay reasonable freight rates to consuming points, the West must diversify her interests and industries and develop her resources along other lines than agriculture; and in this endeavor she should bear in mind that irrigation and drainage projects which render her independent of uncertainties in rainfall will at the same time cause the abandonment of those semiarid sections where irrigation is impossible. Let us see to it that the farmer is put in a position where he can borrow money at reasonable rates for loans that are justified by a wise and comprehensive view of the future. Credits that will bring immediate and rich rewards to contractors and land speculators without regard to the possibility of profitable and permanent markets will do the farmers of to-day more harm than good. In a word, with all its drawbacks and hardships, agriculture is the most satisfactory occupation in the world if it can be made to pay, but the question as to when, where, and how it can be made to pay is one that Congress can not answer, and a difference of 1 or even 2 per cent in the interest rate which a farmer pays for a long or short time loan will become a more or less important item in his balance sheet as he wisely or unwisely meets conditions and limitations which he himself can and must control if he expects to operate at a profit. Last, but not least, the farmer should never forget that in the general run of crises and depressions prices go down when interest rates go down and prices go up when interest rates go up. He can take his choice, but he can not reverse this order.

During Mr. McLEAN'S speech,

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the Senate will have to adjourn when we close the session to-day, and I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the Senator from Washington to state the circumstances which lead him to make the request.

Mr. JONES of Washington. On account of the death of a Member of the House from New Mexico, we expect to adjourn to-day, which will mean that two hours will have to be taken for the morning business to-morrow, and I would like to have the Senate start a little earlier than 12 o'clock.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest to the Senator that the Senate take the customary adjournment, although I do not care to object to the request. It will be a physical impossibility to get a quorum here within half an hour or 40 minutes after we meet. Senators will not understand that the adjournment is to 11 o'clock, in all probability, and we will gain very little time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will not submit the request at the present time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is withdrawn.

After Mr. McLEAN'S speech,

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am not going to discuss any of the proposed farm-credit measures at this time. I merely wish to say a word or two following the speech of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN].

The chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, the Senator from Connecticut, has offered considerable advice to the farmers of the country. I remember, when we were trying to arouse the Senator's sympathy and to secure his cooperation when it was desired to reduce the rediscount rate which was burdening the farmers of the country, that the Senator one day took me to task for having introduced a joint resolution which had for its purpose a reduction of the rediscount rate. The Senator suggests now that we should be very careful about providing facilities through which the farmer may go more deeply into debt. Well, Mr. President, we expect to provide some facilities now by which the farmer may obtain money on his products, and the final show-down in the Senate will reveal the fact as to who are the friends of the farmer and who are not.

There is no excuse now for makeshift legislation; there is no excuse for legislation that will dodge and evade the issue. Subterfuges will not work if the friends of the farmers are alert and stand together with unity of purpose and in concerted action. We have seen deflation at the high tide when it swept down property values in the South and West and destroyed them by the billions of dollars.

When I stood here in my place for two years, week after week and month after month, pleading for some power to force the Federal Reserve Board to change its policy and to loosen up so that money could be obtained by the farmers, we were told that the Federal reserve system was not suited to the needs of agriculture. I never agreed to that suggestion, but we were so told. Now, when we come to submit that there must be some legislation enacted, which will meet the needs of the farmer in season and out of season, we are told that the Federal reserve system is adequate to take care of the needs of the farmer.

I hold that at the time drastic and destructive deflation was imposed upon us, farm products were eligible at the Federal reserve banks, and I state as a fact that such products were accepted at the banks and farmers did obtain money on their wheat and on their cotton and on their cattle prior to the time that the deflation order went out from Wall Street and was put into effect by one William P. G. Harding, who has now gone off the Federal Reserve Board for good, the Lord be praised. I see that he has given out a statement to the effect that he withdrew his name from the list of those presented for consideration by the President. I think it was high time that he did withdraw his name. He permitted his name to remain on the list long after I and others knew that he would not be appointed. I have known for weeks that he was not going to be reappointed, and a "wayfaring man" could have told that he never could have been confirmed if his name had been sent to the Senate, for there never was a time when more than two Democrats would have voted for his confirmation in the Senate, and there were several Republicans from the West who would not have voted for his confirmation. It was reported that the President would have appointed him if he had been assured that he would be confirmed. But he could not be confirmed.

To return to the issue, we were told that the Federal reserve system was not suited to the needs of agriculture and that we ought to provide a system that would be suitable. That argument was used to get away as best you could from a situation that was then confronting us. Now it is thought, I suppose, that that is far enough behind us for us to have forgotten it. Those who make that assumption are mistaken. They tell us that we do not need any legislation for the farmer, but that what the farmer needs is to be more industrious and enterprising. That is the kind of suggestions we have made to us now.

Mr. President, the farmer never was more enterprising and industrious than he was in the year 1920. He went to work early in the morning and labored until late in the afternoon. No one can charge that he was indolent, lazy, or neglectful of his duty in the field of agriculture. He made his crop; but when he took his products to the market place he was clubbed to his knees, and while he was unconscious his substance was taken from him and he was left in dazed condition upon the ground. He was nearly dead, while interests in Wall Street made not only millions of dollars but hundreds of millions and even billions of dollars out of the farmers' misfortune in 1920. It is an awful calamity that we have seen visited upon the farmer. Mr. President, the cry comes up from the farmers everywhere, "Do something; do not let us be subjected to such robbery again."

The Senator from Connecticut recited some statistics informing us how much money was on deposit in certain big banks, and trying to prove by that that the matter of getting money was easy; that there was no necessity for providing other ways for obtaining money. What does it profit me if I am hungry and there are millions of pounds of food stored hard by if I can not get to the food? It does not do me any good; it might just as well be sunk in the ocean or burned up with the flames so far as appeasing my hunger is concerned. I do not get it; I have no access to it; and reciting statistics to prove that because there is money stored in certain banks the facilities to furnish the farmer with credit are adequate is utterly ridiculous.

That argument may suit some people. I am satisfied that I can assemble an audience that would be highly pleased with that argument. They are the fellows who bought Liberty bonds for eighty and eighty-five on the hundred when they were forced upon the market. They are the fellows who made money out of cotton beaten down from 40 cents to 10 cents a pound. They are the fellows who made money out of wheat driven from $2.50 to 90 cents a bushel. They are the people who made money out of the sacrifice of half the mother herds of the West. They are the men who would rejoice and be glad to hear an argument like that.

They are really alarmed now with the fear that the farmer will get further into debt. Mr. President, that is almost an impossibility. He already has his farm mortgaged. He already has his live stock mortgaged. He is already forced to mortgage the growing crop. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] comes now with his little palliative phrases, but they will not work. He suggests that "we had a time of distress here in 1920 and 1921, and the farmers and a good many bankers blamed it on the Federal Reserve Board." Well, Mr. President, if the Senator from Connecticut does not agree now that we did have the deflation and that it was brought about by a conspiracy born in Wall Street and carried out through the Federal Reserve Board, with Governor Harding at its head, he is away behind the procession.

Before the campaign waxed very old last fall, after I had exposed this matter here for months, and Republican Senators and Members of the House went home, and their people told them that the deflation drive had practically ruined the people, and that the Republican Party, which had kept this board in power, was being blamed for it, having promised it in their platform, and the President having promised it in his acceptance speech, they said: "Something is necessary to be done. You had better get the President to come out and say something against it," and the President issued a statement that those who brought on drastic deflation were responsible for this hard time that the farmers were having. So the Senator from Connecticut will do well to read the utterances of the Republican President.

I thought we had passed the stage where anybody denied that we had deflation. I thought that was an accepted fact. I am going to print, in this connection, excerpts from an article which appeared in the Manufacturers' Record, by Prof. Gustav Cassel, of Sweden, and Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale, discussing the world business conditions. It is a scathing review by Professor Cassel of the policy of deflation which forced other countries to follow our destructive deflation campaign, while Professor Fisher attributes to the same cause the world's labor unrest and much of bolshevistic agitation,

Why, not only did they produce deflation in America but they started the work of deflation and forced other countries to follow in our wake, and caused financial distress the world over. The policy of deflation started by Wall Street and carried out by this man W. P. G. Harding, who is now going to be governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston at a salary of $25,000 a year, brought this business depression and financial distress not only to our country but to the world. Able financiers in the Old World have published articles and made speeches in which they state that the drastic deflation commenced in the United States was responsible for the financial ills that followed. I showed here in a speech once before that the deflationists wanted the War Finance Corporation suspended because it was furnishing money to foreign interests that were buying American goods and helping to furnish us markets for our products, and one of the arguments made by them was to the effect that aiding these foreigners to buy our goods helped to put prices up on products here at home, and they wanted to prevent that. Therefore, they stopped giving aid to those who were buying our goods, in order to break down the market here at home. And they did it.

It was deflation with a vengeance, the most cruel thing that ever happened to a free people, and I want to serve notice again, as I have done time and time again, that they are never going to get away from the truth, which shows that it was cruel, destructive, deadly deflation, a crime against the American people. If they think they can educate us into the belief that it was a natural consequence following the war, they are reckoning without their host. I declare to you to-day that at the time this deflation was started there was no occasion for it under the sun. I assert to-day, without fear of successful contradiction, that at the time they deflated currency and credits over $2,000,000,000 we could have put $2,000,000,000 more into the field and saved the day without ever getting within reach of the gold reserve. Let them answer that if they can. If they can not answer that, they confess that they are guilty of the most diabolical crime ever perpetrated by a band of greedy money marauders against a free people.

We needed a man in the White House like Old Hickory Jackson. You know what he told old Biddle. Biddle threatened to bring on deflation and produce a panic, and Old Hickory said, "If you do, I will hang you," and Biddle did not do it. I would not permit any money lord in the land to tie up the circulating medium of my country, to lock up the money supply and paralyze the business of 100,000,000 people. The man that will do that ought to be hanged. Why not hang them? Fifteen thousand men killed themselves because of that deflation. Would it not be better to hang one or two and save the lives of 15,000 men and women and at the same time prevent the commission of a crime that outraged and robbed millions of people? Fifteen thousand people took their own lives during that dreadful and terrible period, and then some Senators stand up and say, "It is a natural consequence." I deny it. It was deliberately planned, made to order, and those who directed and made money out of it are criminals, simply criminals.

The Senator said the farmers and some bankers blame the Federal Reserve Board for the failure to get all the credit they wanted. Well, if you had some cotton and cattle and a farm and a horse and household of goods, and you had to mortgage all of them, and you had produced enough on your farm at fair prices to pay off your mortgage and save your farm and your home, and you were to go to that bank and say, "I want to get some funds," or "I want an extension of time," or "I want to renew my note," and the banker were to tell you that he could not do that, and you were to say, "Well, I have some Liberty bonds and I want to get some money on them," and the banker were to say, "We would be glad to do it, but the Federal Reserve Board has sent word down the line to us all that we must not loan on Liberty bonds," and you could not get a loan on Liberty bonds, and then you were to say, "I must hold my products until the price goes back to a point that will cover the cost of production," and they were to tell you that they could not assist you, that the Federal Reserve Board had ordered loans on farm products to cease, would you not feel like blaming it on somebody? If you did blame it on somebody, you certainly would want to blame it on those from whom that word came and that order had been issued; and the Federal Reserve Board was the party that did it. They were right in blaming it on them.

Did not Congressman SWING, of California, say in a speech in the House several weeks ago that he was in the bankers' convention in southern California and heard an agent of the Federal reserve bank tell the bankers not to loan any more money on farm products? Of course he did. That word was quietly sent out to the bankers all over the agricultural sections.

Mr. President, the time was, I regret to say, when Senators and Members of the House in the main would leave it to a Banking and Currency Committee to get up information about matters that pertained to the banking business of the country; and when matters of that sort came in, they relied mainly upon those on that committee to discuss them, and they followed their suggestions. I found, however, by an experience of two years in this body that there were men on this Banking and Currency Committee whom I was not willing to follow; men who even defended deflation. I do not mean by that to say that they did not want to do what they considered was the right thing, but their environment was such that they did not know how to consider these problems from the right standpoint. Why, I thought while the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] was reading his speech that I should like to hear him make that speech to the farmers out in Iowa or out in some other Western State. I should like to hear him deliver it in the State of Texas or in my State of Alabama, where people know that contrary to the thing he was saying was the fact as it applied to those people down there, and yet I suppose he thinks he is right about it. That may be the New England idea, but it is not the idea of the great agricultural section of the country; and if the agricultural people have to rely upon such for relief the situation, I fear, is pretty gloomy. But we are not going to do that. We are going to undertake to amend the so-called farm credits bill as reported. That is what we should do.

Mr. President, I am anxious that we shall not pass a bill and call it a farm credit bill that is not worth the paper that it is written on. If we are going to legislate for the farmer, let us do it. If we are not, let us tell him so.

The Senator from Connecticut tried to frighten us by saying that if we had not put some sort of a check on inflation we would have been like Russia or Germany. Mr. President, you can not deceive the American people with anything like that; it can not be done. We know that with the resources of this, the richest country in all the world, no such condition as obtains in Russia could obtain here in a quarter of a century.

I want to say to the Senator from Connecticut regarding Germany—and I want him to challenge the statement and answer it if he can—that I assert to-day that the farmers of Germany are more nearly out of debt than the farmers of the United States and that a larger proportion of them own their farms.

Let him challenge that statement. The individual farmer in Germany, while inflation was on at the high tide, was permitted to pay his debts with the inflated mark, and he wiped out his indebtedness and is free of debt to-day. If Germany should burn every mark that is printed and start on another basis, the farmer would be out of debt and ready to start again under the new order. Can you say that for America? What did you do in the United States? When cotton went up to 40 cents a pound and the farmer could get $200 a bale, you waited until he bought fertilizer from the Fertilizer Trust at high prices, you waited until he bought agricultural implements from the Implement Trust at high prices, you waited until he bought auto trucks and other things and went into debt up to the neck, and after he got in on that basis of 40-cent cotton you struck him down just as the market opened and made him sell his cotton at 10 cents a pound to pay debts incurred on the 40-cent basis.

That is what you did in the United States under the reign of the Republican Party; and Germany, distracted Germany, permitted her farmers to pay off their mortgages and settle their debts with the inflated mark, and the individual German farmer is freer of debt to-day than the farmer in the United States of America. I submit to the Senate and to fair-minded people everywhere that if they permitted the farmers of the South and West to go into debt for that year on the 40-cent basis, common honesty required that they permit them to go that year through on that arrangement and settle those debts on that basis.

I quote Mr. Lincoln when he said, "Any change in the circulating medium under which a debt is contracted before the debt can be paid is a crime." I commend that quotation to the Senator from Connecticut.

The Senator said the printing press is still raining paper money in Russia and Germany. Such a statement does not answer the charge that deflation precipitate and destructive produced distress and suffering among four-fifths of the population of the United States.

The Senator said that some of the Senators had promised 50-cent cotton. I have heard that before. I have never seen the Senator who promised it. Some of the newspapers, inspired by the hirelings of Wall Street, said that I promised 50-cent cotton. I did not do it. I said I thought cotton would go to 50 cents. It did go to 47 cents. I said I thought it would go to 50 cents, and I can prove by any fair-minded man that if the farmer could have borrowed money on his cotton in 1920 it would have gone to 50 cents, and ought to have gone to 50 cents, because he paid high prices for everything he bought; and not only that, the American people paid for finished cotton goods, after cotton went down to 10 cents a pound, the same as they paid for them when cotton was 40 cents a pound.

I called attention on the floor of the Senate to the fact that when cotton was down to 11 cents I bought a cotton collar in the city of Washington for 25 cents, and that one bale of cotton, bringing fifty or sixty dollars, made into cotton collars like that, would sell for about $1,100. The consumer did not get the benefit of that. Who got it? Certain New England spinners and speculators got the money. How did the speculators get it? They went on the exchange and borrowed money from the Federal reserve banking institution in New York at 6 per cent to sell cotton at 40 cents, and beat the price down to 30, and when it went to 30 made $50 a bale on every bale they sold; if they held it until it went to 20, they made $100 on every bale. If they held it until it went to 10, they made $150 on every bale. They made big money speculating in cotton. What was being done to the cotton farmer? I asked William P. G. Harding, before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, in the Senate Office Building, in December, 1920, "Governor Harding, do you not know that some bankers in Alabama complained to you about not being able to get money on cotton in October, 1920?"

He said, "I remember when some bankers at Birmingham tried to get me to let them borrow money to hold cotton until it went back to 40 cents, and I would not do it."

Mr. President, if he had permitted them to borrow money they could have held it, and it would have gone back to 40 cents. What could have kept it from going back to that price? It was then down to about 35 cents, and just had to go up 5 cents to get back to 40 cents. Of course it would have gone back. Then what would have happened? Those farmers would have paid off their debts, and at Christmas, 1920, the board could have said to our people, "We are going to start in on the New Year with a new order of things. We are going to bring about in a very orderly way, slowly and very gradually, deflation so that nobody will be seriously hurt. We will let you get your 40 cents for cotton this year and let you get good prices for wheat and cattle and wipe out your indebtedness and start out in the New Year with your debts all paid."

That would have been honest. But they did not do that for the farmer, merchant, and banker in the agricultural sections, but they did tell certain big rich men and financiers that they were going to deflate, and gave them notice 60 and 90 days in advance, and a man of considerable means out in the State of my good friend from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] told him he was going to convert his property into money and get in the market so that he could make a fortune, and said he knew what he was talking about; that the Republicans were going to deflate.

I repeat, the farmer and other people in the agricultural sections got no notice. The first notice they had was when they were fired upon by the big guns of drastic deflation.

Mr. President, another thought on the line that certain statesmen promised 50-cent cotton. At the same time this drive of which I am speaking was going on, beating the price of cotton down and down, the president of the American Cotton Association, Mr. Wannamaker, came to Washington, went before the board, and begged Governor Harding to change his policy. Both Senators from North Carolina went with delegations and appealed to him to change his policy. Other Senators from the South went. He even turned his back and told one of them that he had heard enough; he was impatient about it. Mr. President, at that same time one of the spinners was quoted in the New York Commercial as saying:

> We are willing to pay 30 cents for cotton. We want the price stabilized.

I submit that if the spinner was willing to pay 30 cents, which price would just about cover the cost of production and get a farmer out of debt, would it not have been right and fair and just to permit the farmer to have the money to make the price stay up to what the spinner suggested he was willing to pay and enable him to get out of debt, to save his home, to save his farm, and to keep hundreds from blowing out their brains? But we could not get it.

I know that cotton would have gone back to 40 cents, and gone higher than that, if the farmer could have gotten money so as to hold it. What was to keep it from going higher? That year's crop was consumed, just as every other year's crop had been. If he had been able to hold it during that time the price would have gone up, and the farmer would have come out of that storm and death-spreading cyclone out of debt and would have been able to start in the year 1921 debt free under quite different conditions.

I had a letter from one of the commissioners of agriculture in a cotton-growing State the other day, who told me that unless the farmer could get 30 or 35 cents for cotton he did not know how many years it would take to pay the debts unloaded on him by deflation in 1920 and 1921. This is a serious thing with us, Senators.

The clever Senator from Connecticut does not know a thing on earth about conditions in my section of the country. His speech shows that. He does not know anything on earth about conditions in the grain-growing and cattle-producing West. His speech shows it. But his speech gives the situation exactly as it is in the East. There has not been any trouble about them getting money. They got it all during deflation at 6 per cent flat, when the farmers of the other sections were paying 15, 20, and higher, and one little bank in my State paid 87½ per cent. That is the highest interest rate ever charged by any banking institution since the morning stars sang together. Then they say deflation had to come following the war. It was a premeditated crime, black as midnight. That is what it was.

I have seen some of the articles and some of the literature these smooth artists in Wall Street are sending out. They even send them to us, and tell us to be very cautious about what sort of a farm credits bill we get out; that we should be exceedingly careful.

Mr. President, that is what I am speaking for this afternoon—to give a few suggestions to some of my friends who were not in the Chamber to hear the speech of the Senator from Connecticut, that we must be exceedingly careful not to take something that may sound well when there is no substance in it.

The Senator talks about the farmer taking his chance and taking his medicine. There was passed through a Republican Congress a progressive interest rate, and the board was given authority to put it into effect, and they put it into effect nowhere in the East but put it into effect in the South and West. That was the question I wanted to ask the Senator from Connecticut when he said he preferred to go along and finish his prepared speech. I was going to ask him why it was that the progressive interest rate was applied to my State and the other Southern States, and the Western States in the agricultural and cattle sections, and not applied at all in his State and New York or any other Eastern State. Certainly they ought to be grateful to the Federal Reserve Board. If it had so ordered deflation as to take care of my State and I had not known about how it affected other States, I might have been willing to sing its praises. But they slaughtered business in my State, and slaughtered it in all the other States of the South and West, and I do not propose to sit silent and permit the friends of deflation to confuse the situation if I can help it.

The Senator suggests that if we set up a separate board, that that board will try to undertake to tell the farmer how many hens he can set for hatching purposes, how many eggs he can put under a hen, and how many pigs he will have on his premises. How ridiculous and how solicitous and sympathetic is the Senator from Connecticut for the farmer. It is all so sudden!

The idea of us wanting to create a board that would even think of trying to tell a farmer about those minute details. It never was contemplated by anybody, and no such suggestion as that will drive anybody away from the fixed purpose of passing real legislation in the interest of the farmer. I am for a sound banking system all the time and we want the farmer to have access to such an institution at all times. That is about all I desire to say.

I ask to have printed in 8-point type at this point excerpts from the article to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Manufacturers' Record, January 4, 1923.]

PROF. GUSTAV CASSEL, OF SWEDEN, AND PROF. IRVING FISHER, OF YALE, DISCUSS WORLD'S BUSINESS CONDITIONS—A SCATHING REVIEW BY PROFESSOR CASSEL OF THE POLICY OF DEFLATION WHICH FORCED OTHER COUNTRIES TO FOLLOW OUR DESTRUCTIVE DEFLATION CAMPAIGN, WHILE PROFESSOR FISHER ATTRIBUTES TO SAME CAUSE WORLD'S LABOR UNREST AND MUCH OF BOLSHEVISTIC AGITATION.

Gustav Cassel, recognized as probably the foremost economist of Europe, and by reason of that fact twice asked by the League of Nations to make a report on the world's financial conditions, has recently issued a 287-page book entitled "Money and Foreign Exchange After 1914."

In this work Professor Cassel discusses from every standpoint the world's monetary problems. It is one of the illuminating publications of the age, and by reason of the author's preeminent standing will command universal attention in this country and in Europe among all thinking people who are anxiously seeking the way out of the world's business and financial chaos, and a safer basis on which to carry on world trade.

It should be a matter of profound interest to the readers of the Manufacturers' Record that every position which it has taken since 1917 on the certainty that drastic deflation of credits would bring on world business chaos has been overwhelmingly sustained by this work of Professor Cassel.

* * * * * * *

From the closing chapters of his book, which deal more especially with the operations of the Federal reserve management and the destructive power of deflation to break down all business in this country and throughout the world, we have taken a few striking sentences here and there. Professor Cassel reminds his readers of his warnings against deflation and he clearly shows by the official records of the Federal Reserve Board that it carried on a definite campaign of deflation for the purpose of breaking down prices. At one point he says: "The Federal Reserve Board entirely overlooked the one factor which in the whole of this great complicated process was itself the principal driving force—the board's own deflationist policy; or perhaps, let us say, rather the restrictive bank policy which the board pursued and which in itself inevitably implied deflation." What a charge to bring against the management of the financial system of this country in that it entirely overlooked the vital factor which meant either national and international poverty or national and international prosperity!

Referring to this deflation policy of the Federal reserve system, Professor Cassel says:

"The general depression at present prevailing throughout the world is very largely a result of this process of deflation."

That is a point which the Manufacturers' Record has over and over stated since it began its fight against what it saw was the inevitable collapse of the world's business if the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board and the international bankers, which seemed to have guided its operations, was carried out.

"The deflationist policy of the United States can scarcely be said to have served any wise purpose" is the way in which Professor Cassel once more states a great truth and in vivid language.

In this connection it is worth while to remind our readers that Prof. Irving Fisher, professor of political economy in Yale University, in a statement widely published two weeks ago, emphasized the great danger to the world of the deflation policy to which he attributes the turmoil of labor interests in this and other countries, and in which he points out his agreement with Professor Cassel as to the disastrous results of deflation. Professor Fisher has long been seeking to impress upon the people of this country the danger of a fluctuating dollar, for no intelligent man any longer believes that the supposed "yardstick" by which values are measured, so long attributed to gold, has any existence in reality.

Whatever may be the way out of present conditions and the way to lead to the stability of values and of business, the question at issue is one of such tremendous moment, one upon which civilization itself may depend, that it demands an unbiased study on the part of every thoughtful man who realizes the magnitude of these problems.

Professor Fisher's statement is as follows:

"A recent circular sent to bankers and employers expresses deep anxiety over the Fascisti victory in Italy and the gains of the labor party in England and elsewhere. It predicts that the same idea of the political domination of labor will soon appear more explicitly in America and will threaten the existing order.

"I believe that bankers and employers, not to say the rest of us, have cause for anxiety. But what the circular overlooks is that, as Roosevelt so often warned us, the only real escape from the danger of an overturn lies in redressing real grievances.

"What is needed is to interpret the recent labor unrest as symptoms of social diseases needing to be cured.

"There are several such social diseases which I could name, and probably several others which would be revealed by a searching investigation. But here I shall point out only one—probably by far the most important. This is the unstable money growing out of the war.

"But what has unstable money to do with recent labor unrest? We do not remember seeing any mention of it in the newspapers. Yet to find it we do not have to seek far. We can trace our way back in three simple steps from the recent political demonstration of labor discontent to unstable money as a prime cause.

"The first step brings us to unemployment as the grievance which, more than any other, caused labor to make its recent political commotion. The English labor preelection manifests said, among other things:

"'Unemployment and low wages, caused largely by the policy of the Liberal and Unionist government, have brought distress to the bulk of the working people.'

"Since the election in which labor came off second best, the unemployed have been demanding a hearing with Bonar Law.

"In other words, labor in England held the Lloyd-George government responsible for the vast unemployment during the last two years and will hold the Bonar Law government responsible for putting an end to unemployment.

"The opportunity to work is likewise the demand of the Fascisti in Italy. In America also the backswing of the last election is largely because of the depression of trade and unemployment.

"Next we trace back this depression of trade and unemployment, whether in America, England, Italy, or elsewhere, to the fall of prices in 1920 and 1921.

"Always and inevitably a great fall of prices kills enterprise, closes factories, discourages farmers, and throws men out of work.

"Going still further back, we may trace the fall of prices to the deflation of credit and money beginning early in 1920. As Professor Cassel, of Sweden, shows so clearly in his Money and Foreign Exchange After 1914, just published, and as every other economist knows so well, this restriction of credit which bankers in so many countries began in 1920 was the main reason for the fall of prices which bankrupted thousands of farmers and business men and made millions of workers idle.

"And there you have it! The chain of causes: Deflation, fall of prices, unemployment, producing political vindictiveness.

* * * * * * *

"If those now so anxious over labor unrest, for fear their own pocketbooks will be injured, once realized that there are those real grievances from inflation and deflation (which are what 'unstable money' means) they would do something else than wring their hands in bewildered anxiety.

* * * * * * *

"As stated at the outset, of course there are other grievances. But it is doubtful if any are so important as those produced by inflation and deflation. Lord D'Abernon, now British ambassador to Germany and one of the masters of this subject, once said that he believed 90 per cent of the world's Bolshevism came from unstable money. That is a higher percentage than I would ascribe, but I believe over 50 per cent would be a conservative estimate.

"And the worst of it is that neither labor nor capital has yet clearly seen the situation. Labor is therefore now on the rampage and is quite likely to hang the wrong man to the lamppost, while capital does nothing except to demand that nothing be done. When both sides demand and obtain stable money over half of their difficulties will disappear."

PROFESSOR CASSEL'S REVIEW OF WORLD FINANCIAL CONDITIONS.

From Professor Cassel's book, Money and Foreign Exchange After 1914, by Gustav Cassel, published by Macmillan Co., New York, we take the following extracts, picked here and there, without continuity, but all bearing on the effect of the Federal Reserve Board's deflation campaign:

"* * * Monetary deflation must, in the long run, tend to depress industry, since a steady and persistent fall in prices necessarily diminishes and discourages trading activity. If trade depression becomes sufficiently acute, monetary deflation will sooner or later be impossible, because of the Government's inability to collect sufficient from the profits of industry to meet all outgoings. If the policy is persisted in after the time for it has passed, a grave danger arises, for the payment of taxation will then involve trespassing upon the capital, and this, by retarding trade recovery and reducing the Nation's productive capacity, will accentuate the very evils it is desired to cure."—(From Monthly Review of Barclay's Bank, December, 1921, quoted by Cassel with approval.)

"More than four years after the appointment of the committee (Cunliffe committee appointed in 1918 to examine different problems likely to arise during reconstruction in England) their demand—the restoration of the gold standard—is still unsatisfied, whereas the depression which could be foreseen as a consequence of the deflation policy has set in, and has shown itself to be of an extremely serious character. * * *

"In an article in the Economic Journal for March, 1920 ('Further Observations on the World's Monetary Problems'), I expressed the opinion that a process which aimed at reducing prices to their former level would probably ultimately prove still more disastrous than the process of inflation had been. The prospect of a long period of falling prices would kill all enterprise and hamper the process of reconstruction. Further, an increase in the value of gold would for many countries aggravate the difficulties of reverting to a gold standard and very seriously increase their already overwhelming financial burdens. * * *

"In opposition to the then prevailing idea that deflation could be attained by such increase in production as would bring it on a level with the provisions of means of payment—i. e., without any reduction of already existing means of payment—I showed that this was bound to be a very slow process. With a normal rate of progress of, let us say, 3 per cent per annum, it would take 31 years to overcome an inflation indicated by the index number 250. * * *

"In my first memorandum laid before the International Finance Conference in Brussels I uttered a warning against any attempt at further deflation. * * *

"During 1920 there was carried out in the United States a process of deflation which eventually resulted in a violent fall in the general price level, and consequently a corresponding rise in the purchasing power of the dollar, and thereby also in that of gold. This process having severely complicated the exchange problem for other countries, it has naturally attracted lively attention throughout the world. Now, afterwards, people in the United States have wanted to make out that the fall in prices was spontaneous and that no deflationist policy—that is, a process aiming at raising the internal value of the dollar—had ever been deliberately pursued.

"Bank administration in the United States, as in so many other countries, has worked on the idea that any restriction found to be necessary ought to be confined to credits 'for speculative purposes,' and would not need to affect so-called 'legitimate' credits. In reality no such distinction is possible. Stern measures designed to reduce speculative credit are almost bound to react in a thousand different ways on the whole of the industrial life of a country and to reduce the total volume of credit. Still more impossible is it to place an effective restriction upon all credit for speculative purposes without thereby forcing on a general fall in prices. The scheme for suppressing the granting of credit for purposes of speculation must, therefore, in itself have already involved a scheme for reducing the level of prices. That this object formed the gist of the Federal reserve banks' restrictive-credit policy seems only natural; at any rate this policy must have appeared to the mind of the public as a logical continuation of the Government's vigorous campaign for reducing the level of prices. * * *

"In its number dated the 1st of October, 1919, the Federal Reserve Bulletin discusses the problem of the high cost of living, and refers to the measures taken by the Government against the rise in prices. In direct reference to this subject the journal says: 'The problem of reducing the cost of living is, however, mainly that of restoring the purchasing power of the dollar. The dollar has lost purchasing power because the expansion of credit, under the necessities of war financing, proceeded at a rate more rapid than the production and saving of goods. The return to a sound economic condition, and one which will involve as little further disturbance of normal economic relationships as possible, will be a reversal of the process which has brought the country to its present pass. * * * And what is more, the Journal adds: 'The cost of the living problem on its financial side is misconceived, unless it is conceived as the problem of restoring the value of the dollar. To accept the depreciation worked in the dollar by war conditions, and to standardize the dollar of the future on this basis, would be to ratify the inflation wrought by the war and the injustices it produced.' It can hardly be denied that a very definite program of deflation is hereby proposed. * * *

"It is further stated in this number (July, 1920, number of Bulletin) that 'beginning with November, 1919, effort was definitely made to control the reserve position through the application of higher rates of discount at Federal reserve banks,' and that 'the operation of credit control through higher discount rates has had a marked success.' * * *

"The board had repeatedly exhorted the Federal reserve banks to endeavor to induce the member banks to avoid an undue expansion of loans, and to keep the volume of their outstanding credits within reasonable limits. On the 17th of May the chairman of the board had declared, among other things, that 'unnecessary and habitual borrowings should be discouraged, and the liquidation of long-standing, nonessential loans should proceed. Banks were cautioned, however, that drastic steps should be avoided, and that the method adopted should be orderly, and that liquidation will result in permanent improvement, while too rapid deflation would be injurious and should be avoided.

"Here, as it seems to me, is as obvious a program of deflation as can be found anywhere. Efforts are, of course, made to retain as long as possible the idea that a deflation can be effected gradually, and without hampering productive activities. But this is an illusion which is, so to speak, tacked on to the deflationist policy and has no influence whatever upon its actual consequences. * * *

"It must, therefore, have been part of the Federal Reserve Board's policy to bring down the general price level. It is true that after the fall in prices has already set in the board time after time expresses the belief that the bottom has been reached. But in this it is mistaken. The consequences of its restrictive policy are more far-reaching than the board imagines. * * *

"Now, afterwards, whenever an attempt has been made to defend the Federal Reserve Board against the charge of having through a deliberate deflationist policy forced on the fall in prices, with all its appalling consequences, it has been particularly pointed out that the fall in prices took place before the limitation of credits, and that therefore the restrictive bank policy could not have caused the fall in prices. This argument is absolutely untenable. * * * By their energetic efforts at curtailing credits, and especially by their high discount rates, the Federal reserve banks have brought about an extensive and sometimes precipitate realization of accumulated stocks, have severely cut down the demand for capital of all kinds of new construction and improvements, and have thus put a very effective check on enterprise.

"A policy of this kind always proves the surest means of bringing down the price level. The reduced creation of real capital causes less demand for labor and a reduction in wages. With increasing unemployment and falling wages there follows a reduction in purchasing power. Just as the board expected, the current savings which accumulated during that period have been utilized for canceling a part of the superfluous means of payment. By its restriction of credit the board has convinced the public of its serious intentions with regard to the deflationist program, and the public have quite consistently refrained from buying, and that to such an extent that people have talked of a general purchasing strike. Not until the public had worn out their clothes could they be induced out of sheer necessity once more to start buying textiles and boots, which brought about some improvement in the respective markets. Not until the lack of housing accommodations became overwhelming and the prices of materials and labor had fallen considerably did building operations commence gradually to assume more proportions. People are still evidently reluctant to effect purchases in several lines of business, because they either hope or fear for a still further fall in prices. The common purchasing strike, both on the part of business enterprises and consumers, may perhaps be regarded as the immediate cause of the fall in prices. But this purchasing strike has been a direct and natural consequence of the restrictive policy adopted by the bank administration. * * *

"The subsequent process of deflation can also be looked upon as an indication of the effectiveness of the centralized banking system, but in this case the effectiveness has manifestly proved disastrous to the country. The mere effectiveness of an organization is, therefore, not everything. In order successfully to utilize such effectiveness, an administration is required to be capable of fulfilling the most exacting claims; indeed, the greater the effectiveness of the organization the higher will be the claims on the administration. * * *

"However, it is not intended here to lay any stress upon showing up that an error of judgment has been committed, but rather upon pointing out the cause of this error of judgment. And that is quite obvious.

"The Federal Reserve Board entirely overlooked the one factor which in the whole of this great complicated process was itself the principal driving force—the boards' own deflationist policy, or perhaps let us say, rather the restrictive bank policy which the board pursued, and which in itself inevitably implied deflation. I am well aware that both the board and its supporters deny that a deliberate deflation was ever advanced, but what can not be denied is that from the spring of 1920 to the spring of 1921 there took place a very considerable rise in the internal value of the dollar. * * * Just as during the period of inflation the central banks of the world would never openly admit that an internal depreciation of money was taking place, so during the period of deflation they have never been willing fully to acknowledge, at least after the harmful effects of deflation began to appear, that deflation was a monetary phenomenon and involved a fresh change in the monetary unit. With such a standard it was inevitable that the situation should be misjudged while the deflation process was actually being experienced. This was, however, from a practical point of view, very serious, not to say dangerous, for it caused the American central bank management to maintain their restrictive bank policy, even after it had failed to serve any rational purpose and could only encourage a further altogether aimless increase in the internal value of the dollar.

"Other countries who would not willingly see their currency further depreciated in its relation to the dollar had no option but to pursue the same deflationist policy. * * *

"So long as the process of deflation went on, new 'frozen credits' were constantly being created in this way, and the effort to preserve the security and liquidity of the banks seemed ever to demand a continuation of the policy of restriction.

"The fall in prices in America produced a similar effect on the economic conditions in those countries which were buyers of American export commodities. By the time the export commodities had arrived at, let us say, South American ports the prices had already fallen so low that the buyers could not see their way to take the goods at the contracted prices without thereby exposing themselves to severe losses. * * *

"The fall of prices in the United States has thus, in actual fact, failed to benefit exports. The world has here an example from which it should be able to learn something in the way of correcting a very common delusion. In every country during the period of deflation the doctrine was taught that to bring down the price level and to produce more cheaply were the two essential conditions, if a country wished to retain its share of the world market. There can be no doubt that this idea was one of the most potent factors which accelerated the process of deflation. We know that this idea is false. * * *

"This analysis is important, not only because it throws light on what has actually taken place during the period of deflation, but also because it makes it possible to deal with false ideas regarding the nature of the deflationist process. The idea is indeed quite widely entertained that the fall in prices which has taken place since the middle of 1920 has not the character of a deflation—that is to say, has not been the consequence of a restrictive credit policy. This opinion is generally based on the fact that the diminution in the provision of means of payment occurred later than the fall in prices. That this argument is altogether inadequate is obvious from what has just been said. Banks can easily adopt a restrictive credit policy without succeeding in effecting thereby any immediate reduction in the total amount of their credits. * * *

"Those who believe themselves capable of dealing out justice through raising the value of money must further bear in mind that the unprecedented losses caused by the deflationist process may easily render many claims absolutely worthless, and that the creditor then gets but little satisfaction out of the value of the monetary unit on which his claim rests having been improved. If any mention is to be made of justice, then some consideration should also be paid to all the heavily engaged business men and other debtors who are being ruined by the process of deflation, as well as to the masses of unemployed who have been innocent sufferers under this process. * * *

"The depressing influence which a continued reduction of the price level must be expected to exercise over enterprise has not failed to show itself. Dealers have to the utmost possible extent refrained from activity in anticipation of prices reaching their bottom level, and consumers have likewise postponed their purchases as long as possible in the expectation of being able to buy at cheaper prices. Unemployment at an appalling scale has been the result. * * * Each country has suffered not only through its own deflationist policy, but also through that of other countries. As the deflationist policy has naturally to a very great extent paralyzed such forms of production as are required for constructional and building purposes, Swedish industry in particular, which happens to be very largely based on supplying material for such purposes to other countries, has been most seriously affected by the depression caused in those countries by the deflationist policy. * * *

"As was predicted, the process of deflation has proved extremely harmful. The general depression at present prevailing throughout the world is very largely a result of this process of deflation. The unfortunate part is that it can never be determined how far deflation may be responsible for this depression. The mad policy of militarism that has been pursued ever since the armistice and is the cause of true peace not having even yet been attained, is in itself quite sufficient to destroy the world's economic life and to bring ruin and unemployment upon all the nations of the world. But the deflationist policy alone would have been sufficient to produce much the same effect. * * *

"A particularly harmful result of the process of deflation is that the burden of the public debts becomes heavier than the community can bear. When these debts have assumed absolutely fantastic proportions it is bound to be extremely dangerous to attempt a measure tending to make the unit in which the figures are calculated larger. But this is exactly what has been done through deflation. It is probable that some of those countries which by 1920 had already become so overburdened with debts that they had reached the limit of their financial capacity have, through the process of deflation which has gone on ever since, been reduced to a state of actual insolvency.

"As soon as a deflationist program has been laid down, and the means of carrying it through which we possess in the bank policy have been put into practice, a violent fall in prices is the inevitable result. * * *

"The deflationist policy of the United States can scarcely be said to have served any wise purpose. Under prevailing conditions, raising the value of the dollar could only cause a corresponding rise in the value of gold. Such a rise could not possibly be of any benefit to the United States, but for other countries, striving to raise their currencies in value in relation to gold, the rise in the value of gold simply meant, as has been shown in a previous chapter, that all their efforts and sacrifices were made in vain.

"All civilization represents one mighty effort of man to overcome difficulties instead of passively allowing himself to be carried away by them. At the present moment the future of civilization rests in no small degree upon this central will to conquer being able to assert itself in the sphere of money."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PEPPER in the chair). Fifty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Secretary will read the bill.

Mr. MCLEAN. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the formal reading of the bill and that the bill be read for amendments, committee amendments to be considered first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss in detail the necessity of better credit facilities for the agricultural interests of the country and more particularly for the more orderly marketing of crops. I believe all are by this time well aware of the disastrous results that come from forcing upon the market the products of the soil through inability to obtain credit to carry those products until such time as the markets and transportation are no longer glutted by the great flow.

It is my firm conviction that unless credit relief is extended it will be found that the returning prosperity of which there is so much vaunting will be only a flash in the pan. If that is true, the proposed legislation is not for the farmers alone but for all the people.

While there are evidences that business is much recovered, I am justified in saying that the economic position of the great staple-crop farmers of the country is really no better than a year ago, even if not so agonizing as it was in the midst of readjustment and deflation. The farmers of the northeastern regions who are near to their markets and have not suffered from the oppressive transportation charges as western and southern farmers have, and are more favored in some other respects, are comparatively well off, though many of them also suffer from the present maladjustment between agriculture and other economic groups.

Mr. President, as a whole the farmer is still selling low and buying high. His product has nowhere near the purchasing power of the products of other industries as compared with the assumed normal of pre-war times, but even then he suffered in the exchange of his products for the things he required. After making all possible allowance for the fact that agriculture has taken the brunt of readjustment, the truth is it has been going downhill for years.

This retrograde movement is to be attributed chiefly to the weak financial position of agriculture and its lack of business organization in the midst of a world of such organization. The one causes the other, and the farmer moves around in a vicious circle of helplessness. A start has been made in organization, but it is only a start, and it requires the stimulus of adequate financing to go far.

I know of nothing which will contribute more to the general welfare and prosperity than a well-financed agricultural industry which is on an equal marketing footing with the distributing agencies and will have a voice in fixing the prices of its product. At present the farmer buys at a price fixed by the seller and sells at a price fixed by the buyer. All he is asking is to be put in a position where he shall have something to say about the price of what he sells. If it is worth while to have an efficient and sound agricultural industry, it is worth while to do that much for him.

After he produces, the farmer becomes a merchant, but a merchant without the credit facilities of the middlemen and speculators with whom he deals. While they have unlimited funds with which to buy he has none with which to hold back from selling and to bargain on terms of equality. In fact, he sells not according to his judgment and the trend of the market but according to the dictates of pressing necessity or of the masters of such limited credit as he may have. Moreover, he pays more for his slender and precarious credit accommodation than the buyers do for their ample and dependable facilities.

Under existing rural personal credit facilities, the borrowing radius of the individual farmer is necessarily limited. He has no reliable method of drawing on the investment funds of the country for financing his operations as men in other activities have, but is dependent on local facilities of a limited nature. There are virtually no financial institutions that adequately meet the peculiar requirements of an industry that markets its products only once a year, and that sometimes—as in live-stock growing—requires three years to finish its product.

The War Finance Corporation has been very helpful the past year, but it is only an emergency agency. It has, however, demonstrated beyond a doubt that there is a great field for rural financing, and that it is one of legitimate and dependable banking. This does not mean subsidizing agriculture; it means only the use of public agencies to realize a beneficent purpose not otherwise obtainable. If the Government will provide credit channels, the farmers will ultimately pay all the costs thereof, just as they are now doing in the case of the Federal land banks, which are contributing much to solve the problem of rural investment capital in the shape of farm-mortgage loans.

Mr. President, the purpose of Senate bill 4280, introduced by me, is to establish under Federal supervision a national credit system for the agricultural and live-stock interests of the United States. It is designed to accomplish in the field of agricultural credit what the national banking system was designed to accomplish in the banking field.

The bill is analyzed very fully in the committee report, but before turning to a consideration of its detailed terms I desire to discuss in a more general way the purposes of the bill.

In the first place, we must not lose sight of the fact that there is now in existence, and has been for decades, an elaborate network of credit institutions throughout the United States. There are 8,150 national banks, all of which are required by law to be members of the Federal reserve system. There are approximately 22,000 State banks, of which approximately 1,600 are members of the Federal reserve system. There are in addition a large number of live-stock loan companies which make loans upon cattle and sheep. All of the live-stock loan companies and most of the banks are directly or indirectly carrying on at the present time the business of supplying credit to agriculture. It is not my purpose, nor is it, so far as I know, the purpose of any of the advocates of an improved system of rural credits, to supplant these existing institutions. They are scattered from one corner of the United States to another; they have in the aggregate vast financial resources; they have been operating for decades, and in some parts of the country for generations, and they know their business and the needs of the communities in which they are located. The purpose of this bill, and, indeed, of any sound system of agricultural credits, is to retain our existing financial machinery, to alter and improve it only in so far as it is not functioning properly, and to create new institutions only where it seems impossible to achieve the same results in any other way.

The bill, as is generally known by Senators, was drafted as the result of a series of conferences between Managing Director Eugene Meyer and counsel of the War Finance Corporation and representatives of the various agricultural interests. The National American Live Stock Association last August appointed a committee to consider what changes in existing law should be recommended to Congress by the association with respect to live-stock credits. This association, of which the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] is a former president, is a federation of live-stock associations in 18 or 20 Western and Southwestern States, and I know of no body of men better able to express the needs and the desires of the live-stock breeding industry of the United States. This committee met in Washington and held a series of conferences with the managing director of the War Finance Corporation and its counsel. At these conferences a tentative draft of the live-stock sections of the bill now before the Senate was discussed clause by clause. Changes were suggested by the committee and embodied in the draft, and after nearly a week's consideration the draft was approved by the committee. So far as it relates to credits in connection with the breeding and maturing of live stock it may be said without qualification that the bill is what the industry wants.

Shortly thereafter there met here in Washington a national conference of cooperative marketing associations. These associations are composed entirely of agricultural producers who have organized themselves together for the orderly marketing of their commodities. There were present representatives of fruit growers' associations from California, as well as from Florida; grain associations from the Northwest, Middle West, and Southwest; dairy associations from numerous States; cotton associations from virtually every State in the Cotton Belt; tobacco associations from New England, from the South, and from the Middle West; and other associations too many in number and in the diversity of their products to enumerate at this time. It is estimated that the associations represented at the conference will handle during the present year approximately $1,000,000,000 worth of agricultural commodities, and that they represent over 750,000 individual farmers.

The representatives from this conference discussed with the managing director of the War Finance Corporation primarily those portions of the pending bill which relate to marketing credits. They pointed out that, whatever valuable assistance they might receive from specially organized credit corporations under any one of the bills which had been introduced in Congress, their main reliance must always be upon the vast banking structure of the country and upon the Federal reserve system. Their object was to secure such modifications of this existing banking structure as would, in their opinion, render it more serviceable in the financing of agricultural marketing operations. They suggested primarily two changes.

In the first place, they asked that paper issued to finance the marketing of agricultural products be rendered eligible for rediscount in the Federal reserve system with a maturity up to nine months instead of the present limit of six months. Furthermore, they asked that the status of paper of cooperative marketing associations be clarified in order that it would be admissible for rediscount in the Federal reserve system through member banks, with the full maturity allowed to agricultural paper. Specifically, they indorsed in substance those sections of the pending bill contained in title 2 designed to effect these two changes.

The leading State in the Union from the point of view of cooperative marketing is California. In California the movement is of longest standing and has had its most successful development. Recently the legislative committee of the cooperative marketing associations of the State of California, representing associations handling over $250,000,000 worth of products a year, gave the pending bill careful consideration and indorsed it without qualification.

Mr. President, while it gives to those important sections of the agricultural community what they desire in the way of credit legislation, the bill is nevertheless drafted upon lines to which no exception can be taken from the point of view of soundness. It has the indorsement of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the managing director of the War Finance Corporation, both experienced bankers. The provisions embodying amendments to the Federal reserve act have the approval of the acting governor of the Federal Reserve Board. There has been no suggestion from any responsible source that any of these provisions are unsound in principle from the point of view of conservative banking and finance or that they in any way imperil the stability and soundness of the banking and financial structure of the country.

The bill may be said, moreover, to crystallize the experience which the War Finance Corporation has gained in the practical administration of the agricultural credits law of 1921. For nearly a year and a half the War Finance Corporation has been making advances for agricultural and live-stock purposes under the terms of that law, and its work has brought it into practical and intimate touch with the credit requirements of virtually all the agricultural sections of the United States. The work of the War Finance Corporation has naturally divided itself into three parts. It has approved advances to country banks for general agricultural purposes in the amount of $183,000,000. It has approved advances to live-stock loan companies in connection with the financing of cattle and sheep in the amount of $80,000,000. It has approved advances to cooperative associations in connection with the marketing of agricultural commodities in the amount of $180,000,000. The demands upon the corporation from these three sources show clearly where the needs of the agricultural communities lie, and this experience has been used in drafting the pending bill. The need of general banking credits in agricultural sections has been met by the amendments designed to bring more country banks into the Federal reserve system and by increasing to nine months the time of maturity of agricultural paper eligible for rediscount.

The needs of the live-stock industry, in connection with both the breeding and fattening of live stock, are taken care of in the sections creating Federal agricultural credit corporations, and in the provision for rediscountability for live-stock paper with a maturity up to nine months. The needs of the cooperative associations are recognized by express recognition of their paper as agricultural paper.

Another feature of the bill which merits the approval of the Senate is that it will involve the United States Government in no expense. It relies entirely upon private capital and upon private initiative and management. All that the Government will contribute will be a sound plan of organization and efficient and thorough supervision. Some Senators believe that the needs of the farmer can not be completely taken care of without some resort to Government financing. Others believe that private capital, under proper supervision and management, can take care of the situation fully and adequately. Whatever we may think in this regard, however, we must all agree that to the extent that private capital can give proper service to the farmer it should be helped and encouraged to do so. To give such help and encouragement is the purpose of this bill.

Mr. President, without going into too much detail, for the bill is fully analyzed in the committee report, I will now discuss briefly the changes which the bill will make in existing law and in the existing banking structure of the Nation.

The bill is composed of four titles, and the only title which creates any new machinery is Title I. This title provides for the Federal incorporation of agricultural credit corporations, with power to purchase or discount agricultural paper, secured either by agricultural commodities in warehouse or by live stock.

At this point I desire to correct a very general misapprehension as to the function which these credit corporations are expected to perform. It has been frequently said that the new machinery provided in this title will be of value only to those Western States which are largely devoted to the business of breeding and maturing cattle and sheep, and that it will be of no value in the great States of the Middle West and South where cattle and sheep and hogs are fattened for market, or to the producers of our great staple agricultural commodities. This is entirely untrue. The corporations have authority to make loans up to nine months on the security of live stock which is being fattened for market, and they have authority to make advances for the same period against nonperishable agricultural products properly warehoused. Moreover, paper issued or indorsed by these corporations for the purpose of financing the feeding of live stock or the marketing of agricultural products is by a later section rendered eligible for rediscount in the Federal reserve system through a member bank, or, if in the form of acceptances, is eligible for purchase by Federal reserve banks without the intervention of a member bank. In view of these provisions it seems clear that in any agricultural community in which there is a real need for financing in connection with the feeding of cattle or the marketing of nonperishable products it will be possible to organize such a corporation to avail itself of the benefits of the bill.

The provisions as to incorporation and capitalization of these corporations, the conditions and regulations under which they may make advances, indorse and sell paper, and issue debentures, are fully summarized in the report of the committee. The bill provides for these corporations the same efficient banking supervision that is provided for national banks under existing law. This is of the greatest importance. Senators from the live-stock States are familiar with the unfortunate conditions which have prevailed during the past few years in connection with some of the live-stock loan companies operating in those States. These corporations were organized by private capital under State law, and generally without any supervision or examination by State authorities. Some of them borrowed even fifteen or twenty times the amount of their capital; they made loans at inflated prices; they charged extortionate interest rates; and when the agricultural depression set in their financial structure collapsed like a house of cards. Under competent banking supervision these corporations would never have been permitted to engage in such unsound practices. The pending bill provides such supervision for companies organized under its terms.

In this connection also, I will mention briefly another important feature of the bill. It is provided in section 2 of Title I that the Secretary of Agriculture may license persons competent to inspect live stock as a basis for loans. There will thus be created a class of federally licensed live-stock inspectors, certified as to their competence and reliability, upon whom bankers and persons operating live-stock loan companies can call whenever they desire an expert inspection and count of live stock. Such an inspection is, of course, the first requisite of live-stock financing. These inspectors will not be Government employees, and will receive no compensation out of the United States Treasury. Bankers and live-stock men have testified, however, that their services will be of immense value and that such a system will go far to restoring the credit of live-stock paper.

Mr. President, the question may be asked where these agricultural credit corporations will secure the funds necessary for their operations. The initial capital will, it is expected, be subscribed not only by private investors but by banks in the community. Special authority is given in the bill to national banks to subscribe, in a limited amount, to the stock of the corporations, and it is to be hoped that State legislatures will give similar authorization to State banks. These corporations, however, will do a business which may run as high as ten times the amount of their capital stock. Since they are not authorized to receive deposits, they must obtain these funds by borrowing in the investment market. The corporations are, therefore, authorized to sell paper, with or without their indorsement, and to issue debentures secured by the agricultural paper which they have discounted.

To establish channels through which these corporations can obtain the necessary funds, provision is made for the incorporation of larger rediscount corporations, to be organized principally in the larger financial centers. It is expected that such corporations, having a capital stock of $1,000,000 or over, will be organized in the capital centers and will constitute the channel through which the agricultural credit corporations will sell their paper to financial institutions and private investors.

Title I, as I have said, is the only part of the bill which creates any new machinery. Title II is devoted entirely to amendments to the present banking laws. These amendments have two primary purposes in mind: First, to bring into the Federal reserve system as many as possible of the country banks which are not now members of the system, and, second, to make such changes in the rules of eligibility governing agricultural paper as seem necessary to fit the actual requirements of the farmer.

At the present time no State bank may become a member of the Federal reserve system if it has a capital and surplus less than $25,000, in places having a population not exceeding 3,000 inhabitants; or if it has a capital and surplus less than $50,000, in places having a population not exceeding 6,000 inhabitants. In the present bill these limits are reduced to $15,000 and $35,000, respectively.

The other amendments to the Federal reserve act relating to eligibility of agricultural paper for rediscount I have already touched upon. It is provided, briefly, that any paper issued for an agricultural purpose or based on live stock is eligible for rediscount with a maturity up to nine months. Such paper, however, if it has a maturity over six months, may be made the basis of currency issues only if it is secured either by nonperishable commodities in warehouse or by live stock which is being fattened for market. The title also, as I have said, defines as agricultural paper the notes or drafts of cooperative associations issued in connection with their marketing operations. These provisions are of the greatest importance in connection with the marketing of our great agricultural staples, such as cotton, wheat, and tobacco. They will tend to promote the movement, in which the great cooperative marketing associations are playing such an important part, toward the more gradual shipment of crops to market. Every year at harvest time we are faced with a recurring and growingly acute condition of railroad congestion. There are not enough freight cars in the country to handle the peak load of agricultural products, and to manufacture enough cars means added expense which will ultimately fall upon the agricultural producer. We will not solve this problem satisfactorily until we have learned to spread our grain shipments over a longer period of time, and this means orderly marketing. Orderly marketing means more gradual marketing, and more gradual marketing means longer time credits for producers and for their marketing associations.

Title III of the bill contains amendments to the War Finance Corporation act which will permit the corporation to continue making advances for agricultural or export purposes until through the winter of 1923–24. The War Finance Corporation has always been recognized as a temporary emergency organization. Its personnel was built up on an emergency basis, and the hundred or more bankers throughout the country who are serving on its committees in passing upon loans are acting from public-spirited motives and without compensation. It is not proposed to make the War Finance Corporation a permanent institution, and it would be impossible to keep together its organization permanently upon the present basis. It will, however, take some time to set in motion the machinery provided in the pending bill, and it is believed that the War Finance Corporation, if its powers are extended until the spring of 1924, can be of great assistance in this connection.

Finally, in Title IV the bill raises from $10,000 to $25,000 the amount which a Federal land bank may lend to one borrower. This change has been urged by the representatives of many agricultural organizations, and has the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board, as well as the Secretary of the Treasury. At one time there was some doubt whether such a change would not be harmful. A year ago the amount of money available by the sale of farm loan bonds was limited, and the Federal land banks had enough applications for loans in small amounts to absorb completely any funds that could be obtained. Larger loans could therefore have been made only at the expense of the small farmer. At the present time, however, the situation has changed. There is now an established market for Federal farm loan bonds; investment funds are available in large quantities and at reasonable rates, and it is the testimony of those who are charged with the administration of the act that enough money can be obtained to take care of all legitimate needs. It is felt, therefore, that the increase in the limit will be in no way harmful to the small farmer, and will be of great assistance in those sections in which farming must be conducted on a comparatively large scale.

Mr. President, in closing I wish to point out that the provisions contained in the bill now under consideration have met with virtually no opposition. Some people, it is true, think the bill does not go far enough and that additional machinery should be created with Government money and under Government operation. There is nothing in the present bill which will prevent Congress from establishing such additional machinery, either now or later, should it be concluded that such additional machinery is necessary. I think it is generally agreed that this bill is sound, and that it will be helpful. Whatever our views may be as to the necessity of such additional machinery as is provided either in the Lenroot-Anderson bill, which I favor, or in other bills which have been introduced during the present session, I think we can join now in passing the present bill. It embodies those provisions upon which I believe all parties are quite generally agreed. It carries with it the approval of the cooperative marketing associations, of the national associations representing the cattle and sheep industry, of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the War Finance Corporation, and of the Federal Reserve Board. It represents what can be accomplished immediately, without controversy, and upon sound and constructive lines.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill for action on the committee amendments.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the bill, as follows:

TITLE I.

SHORT TITLE.

SEC. 1. That this title may be cited as "The Federal agricultural credits act."

AGRICULTURAL CREDIT CORPORATIONS.

SEC. 2. That corporations for the purpose of providing credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States may be formed by any number of natural persons not less in any case than five. Such persons shall enter into articles of association which shall specify in general terms the object for which the corporation is formed, and may contain any other provisions, not inconsistent with law, which the corporation may see fit to adopt for the regulation of its business and the conduct of its affairs. Such articles of association shall be signed by the persons intending to participate in the organization of the corporation and thereafter shall be forwarded to the Comptroller of the Currency to be filed and preserved in his office.

REQUISITES OF ARTICLES AND CERTIFICATE.

SEC. 3. That persons signing such articles of association shall make an organization certificate which shall specifically state the name of the corporation to be organized, the place where its principal office is to be located, the State or States in which its operations are to be carried on, the amount of its capital stock, and the number of shares into which the same shall be divided, and the fact that the certificate is made to enable the subscribers to avail themselves of the advantages of this act.

The name of each corporation organized under this act shall include the words "Federal agricultural credit."

The said organization certificate and articles of association shall be acknowledged before some judge of a court of record or notary public and shall, together with the acknowledgement thereof duly authenticated by the seal of such court or notary, be transmitted to the Comptroller of the Currency, who shall file, record, and carefully preserve the same in his office.

Upon making and filing the articles of association and organization certificate with the Comptroller of the Currency, and when the Comptroller of the Currency has approved the same and issued a written permit to begin business, the said corporation shall be and become a body corporate, and as such and in the name set forth in the organization certificate shall have power—

(1) To adopt and use a corporate seal.

(2) To have succession for a period of 50 years unless sooner dissolved by the act of shareholders owning two-thirds of its stock or by act of Congress or unless its charter shall be forfeited for violation of law.

(3) To make contracts.

(4) To sue and be sued, complain and defend in any court of law or equity.

(5) To elect or appoint directors and by its board of directors to appoint such officers and employees as may be deemed proper; to define their authority and duties; to fix their salaries; in its discretion to require bonds of any of them and to fix the penalty thereof; and to dismiss at pleasure any of such officers or employees.

(6) To prescribe by its board of directors by-laws not inconsistent with law or the regulations of the Comptroller of the Currency regulating the manner in which its general business may be conducted, its shares of stock be transferred, its directors and officers be elected or appointed, its property transferred, and the privileges granted to it by law be exercised and enjoyed.

(7) To exercise by its board of directors or duly authorized officers or agents all powers specifically granted by the provisions of this act, and such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business for which it is incorporated, within the limitations prescribed by this act; but such corporation shall transact no business, except such as is incidental and necessarily preliminary to its organization, until authorized in writing by the Comptroller of the Currency to commence business under the provisions of this act.

(8) To establish and maintain branches or agencies within the States in which authorized to engage in business under regulations to be prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency.

(9) The affairs of each corporation organized under the provisions of this act shall be managed by not less than five directors, who shall be elected by the stockholders at a meeting to be held at any time before the corporation is authorized by the Comptroller of the Currency to commence business, and afterwards at meetings to be held on such day in January of each year as may be provided in the articles of association. The directors so elected shall hold office for one year, and until their successors are elected and have qualified. Every director and other officer of the corporation shall, before entering upon the duties of his office, take and subscribe an oath before a notary public or other official having a seal and authorized to administer oaths, conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties of his office. Such oath shall be in such form as may be prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency, and shall be filed in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency. Any vacancy in the board shall be filled by appointment by the remaining directors, and any director so appointed shall hold his place until the next election.

POWERS OF THE CORPORATION.

SEC. 4. That each corporation so organized shall have power under such rules and regulations as the Comptroller of the Currency may prescribe:

(1) To make advances upon, to discount, rediscount, or purchase, and to sell or negotiate, with or without its indorsement or guaranty, notes drafts, or bills of exchange, and to accept drafts or bills of exchange, which—

(a) Are issued or drawn for an agricultural purpose, or the proceeds of which have been or are to be used for an agricultural purpose;

(b) Have a maturity, at the time of discount, purchase, or acceptance, not exceeding nine months;

(c) Are secured at the time of discount, purchase, or acceptance by warehouse receipts or other like documents conveying or securing title to nonperishable and readily marketable agricultural products, or by chattel mortgages or other like instruments conferring a first and paramount lien upon live stock which are being fattened for market.

(2) To make advances upon or to discount, rediscount, or purchase, and to sell or negotiate with or without its indorsement or guaranty, notes secured by chattel mortgages conferring a first and paramount lien upon maturing and breeding live stock and dairy herds, and having a maturity at the time of discount, rediscount, or purchase not exceeding three years.

(3) To issue, subject to such regulations as the Comptroller of the Currency may prescribe, collateral trust notes or debentures, with a maturity not exceeding three years, and to pledge as security for such notes or debentures any notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or other securities held by the corporation under the terms of this act. The regulations of the Comptroller of the Currency may prescribe the form of such notes or debentures, and of notes, drafts bills of exchange, warehouse receipts, chattel mortgages, or other instruments which may be pledged as security therefor, the provisions which may be made with regard to release, substitution, or exchange of such securities, and with regard to protection, supervision, inspection, and reinspection of the agricultural commodities or live stock pledged or mortgaged as security therefor.

(4) To subscribe for, acquire, own, buy, sell, and otherwise deal in bonds, notes, Treasury certificates of indebtedness, or other obligations of the United States to such extent as its board of directors may determine.

(5) To act, when requested by the Secretary of the Treasury, as fiscal agent of the United States, and to perform such services as the Secretary of the Treasury may require in connection with the issue, sale, redemption, or repurchase of bonds, notes, Treasury certificates of indebtedness, or other obligations of the United States.

(6) To act as custodian, trustee, or agent for banks or trust companies which are members of the Federal reserve system.

(7) To purchase, hold, acquire, and dispose of shares of the capital stock of any corporation organized under the provisions of section 8 of this act, in an amount not to exceed at any time 20 per cent of its paid-in and unimpaired capital and surplus.

(8) To purchase, hold, and convey real estate for the following purposes, and for no others:

(a) Such as shall be necessary for its accommodation in the transaction of its business.

(b) Such as shall be mortgaged to it in good faith by way of security for loans or advances made, or for debts previously contracted.

(c) Such as shall be conveyed to it in satisfaction of loans or advances made or debts previously contracted in the course of its dealings.

(d) Such as it shall purchase at sales under judgment decrees, or mortgages held by the corporation or shall purchase to secure debts due to it.

Any obligation referred to in paragraphs 1 or 2 of this section which is secured by chattel mortgage upon live stock of an estimated market value at least equal to the face amount of such obligation may be additionally secured by mortgage or deed of trust upon real estate or by other securities under such regulations as may be made by the Comptroller of the Currency.

LIMITATIONS.

SEC. 5. Except as hereinafter in section 8 provided, no corporation organized under this act shall incur liabilities, whether direct or contingent, in excess of ten times its paid-in and unimpaired capital and surplus; nor shall any such corporation make advances to or hold notes or other direct obligations of any person or corporation, or have outstanding acceptances for any person or corporation, in an amount exceeding 20 per cent of the paid-in and unimpaired capital and surplus of such corporation, unless such advances, notes, or other obligations are adequately secured by warehouse receipts representing readily marketable and nonperishable agricultural commodities, in which event the amount of such advances to, or notes or other direct obligations of, such one person, association, or corporation shall not exceed 50 per cent of such paid-in and unimpaired capital and surplus. No such corporation shall purchase, own, or deal in any live stock except live stock taken in the course of liquidation of obligations held by it.

INTEREST RATES.

SEC. 6. Any corporation organized under the provisions of this act may take, receive, reserve, and charge on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidence of debt, interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the State in which such obligation is by its terms made payable.

The taking, receiving, reserving, or charging a rate of interest greater than is allowed by the preceding paragraph, when knowingly done, shall be deemed a forfeiture of the entire interest which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt carries with it or which has been agreed to be paid thereon. In case the greater rate of interest has been paid, the person by whom it has been paid, or his legal representative, may recover back in an action in the nature of an action for debt twice the amount of the interest thus paid from the corporation taking or receiving the same, provided such action is commenced within two years from the time the usurious transaction occurred.

CAPITAL STOCK.

SEC. 7. That no corporation organized under the provisions of this act shall be permitted to commence business with a paid-in capital of less than $250,000; and no permit to begin business shall be issued to any such corporation by the Comptroller of the Currency until there shall have been filed with him a certificate signed by the president or treasurer and by individuals comprising a majority of the board of directors of such corporation showing that at least 50 per cent of the authorized capital stock of such corporation has been paid in in cash; and the remainder of the capital stock of such corporation shall be paid in installments of at least 10 per cent each on the whole amount of the capital, and the entire authorized capital stock shall be paid in within six months from the date upon which such corporation shall be authorized by the Comptroller of the Currency to commence business. The payment of each installment shall be certified to the Comptroller of the Currency under oath by the president or cashier of such corporation.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask the chairman of the committee whether he thinks it is necessary to the safety of this system that the stock should be limited to a minimum of $250,000 paid-in capital. The thought I have is that there may be a good many communities in the United States where it is quite a problem to raise $250,000 in cash in order to organize one of these corporations. I know it is desirable to have as large a capital as possible in order to meet conditions. It makes it safer, and there is a good deal of power vested in these corporations and a good deal of business is expected to be done by them. At the same time, I have in mind conditions in some parts of the country where it is going to be very difficult to get together $250,000 in cash in order to organize one of these corporations.

I was wondering if the Senator might think that, perhaps, we could reduce that amount a little—say, to $200,000 or $150,000 as a minimum capital for these corporations. This is going to make it very difficult. I think it will limit the number of these corporations organized to a very great extent. They are voluntary organizations. They ought to be strong, and they will be supervised and all that sort of thing, as the bill provides, but it seems to me that there can not be a great many of them organized with the requirement that before they can commence business at all they must pay in at least $250,000. That is a good deal of money to raise in some States and in some communities.

Mr. McLEAN. As a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the Senator knows that the committee thought the corporations should have a capital of at least $250,000. It is for the Senate to say whether that figure shall be reduced. I suggest to the Senator that his point might be postponed for the present, as I would like to have the reading of the bill for committee amendments completed this afternoon, if possible. I think his suggestion is a very important one, and if the amount required as paid in capital is to be reduced, it should have pretty serious consideration.

Mr. FLETCHER. I recall that the committee thought it was well to hold to that figure, but since I have thought more about it and heard from some communities which would be interested in it, I have been impressed with the fact that perhaps we might accomplish better results if we reduce the figure. I did not know whether the Senator had thought more on the subject and whether he was prepared to consent to a reduction there or not.

Mr. McLEAN. I certainly can not consent to it now without consulting the committee. We will have a meeting tomorrow, and we will take that up. The Senator is a member of the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. I can offer the amendment later, of course.

The reading of the bill was continued, as follows:

The capital stock of any such corporation may be increased at any time with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency by a vote of two-thirds of the holders of its issued and outstanding capital stock, or by written consent of all of its shareholders without a meeting and without a formal vote; and may be reduced in like manner: Provided, That in no event shall such capital stock be reduced to an amount less than one-tenth of its then outstanding indebtedness, direct or contingent, or to an amount less than $250,000. No corporation, except as herein provided, shall withdraw or permit to be withdrawn, either in the form of dividends or otherwise, any portion of its paid-in capital, and section 5204 of the United States Revised Statutes, prohibiting the payment of unearned dividends or the withdrawal of capital of national banks, shall be held to apply to corporations organized under the provisions of this act.

The provisions and limitations contained in section 5136 of the United States Revised Statutes, relative to transfer of the shares of the capital stock of national banks, shall apply to corporations organized under the provisions of this act.

Whenever any shareholder or his assign fails, upon demand of the Comptroller of the Currency, to pay his subscription or any part thereof on stock of such corporation subscribed to by him, the directors of the corporation, after 15 days' notice, shall proceed in the manner prescribed by section 5141 of the United States Revised Statutes for the collection of unpaid subscriptions to stock of national banks.

Section 5144 of the United States Revised Statutes, which relates to the right of shareholders of national banks to vote by proxy, shall be held to apply to shareholders of corporations organized under the provisions of this act.

REDISCOUNT CORPORATIONS.

SEC. 8. That corporations having a paid-in capital stock of $1,000,000 or over may be organized under the provisions of this act, to exercise all the powers enumerated in section 4, except that in lieu of the powers conferred in subsections 1 and 2 of said section 4 such corporations shall have power, upon the indorsement of any corporation organized under the terms of this act, to rediscount notes, drafts, bills of exchange, and acceptances for such corporations. Such indorsement shall be deemed to be a waiver of demand notice and protest by such corporation as to its own indorsement exclusively.

Corporations organized under the provisions of this section shall not be subject to the limitations contained in section 5, but the Comptroller of the Currency may by general regulations from time to time prescribe the amount of indebtedness, direct or contingent, which such corporations may incur, and the aggregate amount of paper of different types which such corporations may rediscount for any one corporation.

Corporations with powers limited, as provided in this section, may commence business without deposit of bonds or other obligations of the United States, as provided in section 9 of this act.

PERMIT TO BEGIN BUSINESS.

SEC. 9. That no corporation organized under this act, except corporations with powers limited, as provided in section 8, shall commence business until it has deposited with the Federal reserve bank of the district wherein it has its principal place of business, bonds or other obligations of the United States in an aggregate face amount at least 25 per cent of its paid-in capital stock. Each such corporation shall at all times keep on deposit with such Federal reserve bank an amount of such bonds or other obligations of the United States at least equal in face value to 7½ per cent of the aggregate indebtedness of such corporation, direct or contingent, said amount to include the 25 per cent deposited as hereinbefore provided. Except as hereinafter provided, such bonds or other obligations shall be held by such Federal reserve bank, subject to the direction and control of the Comptroller of the Currency, in trust for the equal and pro rata protection and benefit of all holders of notes, debentures, drafts, bills of exchange or acceptances upon which such corporation may be directly or contingently liable. Upon receipt of proper evidence that the amount of such bonds or other obligations of the United States so deposited exceeds 7½ per cent of such aggregate indebtedness, the Comptroller of the Currency may release such excess, provided that the amount remaining on deposit shall in no event be reduced below 25 per cent of the paid-in capital stock of such corporation. Under such regulations as the Comptroller of the Currency may prescribe, a Federal reserve bank may, upon request of the corporation which deposited the same, sell any such bonds or obligations for account of such corporation, and permit such corporation to use the proceeds thereof for the protection or preservation of any property pledged or mortgaged as security for obligations owned or indorsed by the corporation.

Mr. HARRISON. How long does the Senator intend to have the Senate proceed to-night? There are some provisions to which amendments will be offered, and there ought to be a pretty full attendance.

Mr. McLEAN. The bill is being read now for action on the committee amendments.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that; but there will be amendments offered to some of the committee amendments.

Mr. McLEAN. The committee amendments are printed in the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that an executive session is desired.

Mr. McLEAN. I rather hoped we could finish the reading of the bill for action on the committee amendments this afternoon.

Mr. HARRISON. Some of the amendments will be discussed.

Mr. McLEAN. I ask that the amendment which we have just reached, on page 15, be acted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 15, line 1, after the word "If," strike out the word "the" and insert the word "by," so as to make the clause read:

If by reason of such sale the face amount of such bonds or other obligations of the United States remaining on deposit with such Federal reserve bank shall be less than 7½ per cent of such aggregate indebtedness of the corporation, no further advances shall be made, or notes, drafts, or bills of exchange discounted, rediscounted, accepted, or purchased by such corporation until sufficient additional bonds or other obligations of the United States have been deposited to make good the deficiency.

The amendment was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou in whose presence we wait, we thank Thee for our Republic. It is a goodly vine we have inherited; its clusters of blessings hang richly and its roots run out in many ways for the comfort of all. Help us to understand our responsibilities and to see the possibility of even a nobler patriotism. Make it easier for us to go out and be better citizens and to carry to higher usefulness the influence that we possess. O Father of wisdom and mercy, bless all philanthropies which go forward to teach the ignorant, to give bread to the hungry, and to give freedom to those who are oppressed. Be the refuge for those who are now in the waters of affliction. Keep them close to the Father's heart and may Thy sweet peace enfold their troubled souls. Through Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, January 13, and the Journal of Sunday, January 14, were read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The Calendar for Unanimous Consent is in order to-day, and the Clerk will report the first bill on that calendar.

LAC DU FLAMBEAU BAND OF LAKE SUPERIOR CHIPPEWAS.

The first bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill H. R. 6428, a bill for the enrollment and allotment of the members of the Lac du Flambeau Band of Lake Superior Chippewas, in the State of Wisconsin, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that bill be passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the amendments of the Senate numbered 31 and 36 to the bill (H. R. 13559) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

Also that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 13593. An act making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 13481. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

Also that the Senate had passed Senate bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 265. Joint resolution to stimulate crop production in the United States;

S. 3515. An act for the relief of the New Jersey Shipbuilding & Dredging Co., of Bayonne, N. J.; and

S. 4309. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii,' approved April 30, 1900, as amended, to establish an Hawaiian Homes Commission, granting certain powers to the Board of Harbor Commissioners of the Territory of Hawaii, and for other purposes," approved July 9, 1921.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 13374. An act making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes;

H. R. 13615. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 7658. An act to amend the act approved August 25, 1919, entitled "An act for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes."

COINAGE OF 50-CENT PIECES.

The next bill on the Calendar for Uninamous Consent was the bill H. R. 13194, a bill to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the enunciation of the Monroe doctrine.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, this is the measure which was under consideration two weeks ago, and to which at one time objection was made because of the authority proposed to be given to a civic association in Los Angeles to receive and to the Treasury Department to coin silver 50-cent pieces of a type in commemoration of the Monroe doctrine. I must say that I am not very much in sympathy with this proposal to have cities or private establishments authorized to receive specially designed coin that might be sold at any price, to their own profit.

I would like to have the gentleman who reported the bill give some reason why we should keep on making exceptions. I am aware that last year we authorized the minting of a special coin in commemoration of some local event in Ohio. That was strongly pressed by the congressional delegation of that State. They utilized the fund raised from the sale of the dollar gold pieces to build a highway. If we keep on passing these bills every Member of the House is going to be besieged with demands from his constituents to have some special coin minted that will be for the exclusive benefit of that locality. It is a bad policy—one that is going to plague us if we keep on multiplying these instances.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the Monroe doctrine can not be designated as a local affair.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is going to be a local affair, I will say to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. The Monroe doctrine is not applicable to any one particular locality.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is national in its character, but they are trying to localize it by giving the privilege to this Los Angeles Association to have the exclusive control of these 50-cent pieces. They are trying to localize a national affair in which all the country is interested. Why should the Clearing House Association of Los Angeles have the exclusive privilege of these 50-cent pieces?

Mr. BLANTON. I would rather have this association sell them for a sufficient bonus to finance their celebration than to have them come to Congress for several hundred thousand dollars, as they do in many other localities.

Mr. STAFFORD. Two weeks ago, when this bill was first being considered, I stated the very argument that the gentleman is now advancing, that I would rather have them obtain the funds to meet the expenses through the premium derived from the sale of these coins than to call upon Congress for an appropriation. I am surprised that the gentleman was not here at that time.

Mr. BLANTON. I was here, and some gentleman objected to the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not object to the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, some one did—I think it was the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY]—and it went off the calendar.

Mr. STAFFORD. I stated then that I would not object to the bill, and I did not object to the bill. The gentleman, the proponent of the bill, said that that was not the purpose; that it was merely the purpose to give this association the exclusive right over the 50-cent pieces.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will read the RECORD for December 18, 1922, when the bill was objected to, he will see that I then said that they would sell them for a bonus.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is mistaken; I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. BLANTON. I did not say that the gentleman from Wisconsin stated that; I stated that I said it myself.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, well, I am not responsible for what the gentleman said.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I may say that this is not a new precedent. Of course, it is national in its character. It is the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the enunciation of the Monroe doctrine. They propose in this celebration to make films and pictures of the progress of industry from the time of the enunciation of the Monroe doctrine to the present time, and these pictures and films are to be given to the educational world and will go through the universities and schools of the country.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am more concerned, and the House is more concerned, in what is going to be done with the coins. This bill does not provide for any film. What is the clearing-house association going to do with the coins?

Mr. VESTAL. Just as they did at the centennial in Plymouth and over in Ohio. The coins are sold. Of course, there must be some association to take the coins from the Government. This bill would not have been reported favorably, nor would the Treasury Department have recommended the bill, unless there had been some association to take charge of the coins.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I am getting a different view from what the author of the measure said was the purpose when the bill was last under consideration. I have no objection to the bill if the purpose is to sell these coins at a premium so as to provide for a fitting celebration in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the promulgation of the Monroe doctrine. If that is a fact, as I stated then, I would rather have them get the money in that way than to call on Congress for a fund. Under these circumstances, if the gentleman is quite certain that that is the purpose, I withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute for the bill the bill S. 4096, similar in every way to the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to substitute the bill S. 4096, a similar Senate bill, for the House bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the enunciation of the Monroe doctrine there shall be coined at the mints of the United States silver 50-cent pieces to the number of not more than 300,000 such 50-cent pieces to be of the standard troy weight, composition, diameter, device, and design as shall be fixed by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, which said 50-cent pieces shall be legal tender in any payment to the amount of their face value.

SEC. 2. That the coins herein authorized shall be issued only upon the request of the Los Angeles Clearing House and upon payment by such clearing house to the United States of the par value of such coins.

SEC. 3. That all laws now in force relating to the subsidiary silver coins of the United States and the coining or striking of the same, regulating and guarding the process of coinage, providing for the purchase of material and for the transportation, distribution, and redemption of coins, for the prevention of debasement or counterfeiting, for security of the coin, or for other purposes, whether said laws are penal or otherwise, shall, so far as applicable, apply to the coinage herein authorized: Provided, That the United States shall not be subject to the expense of making the necessary dies and other preparations for this coinage.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is usually present on unanimous-consent days, but he is not the only Member who is always present. Because I indicated part of what transpired in connection with this bill on the last unanimous-consent day, which was December 18, 1922, the gentleman facetiously or otherwise intimated that I was not here, but he will find, if he will examine the RECORD—and in connection with my remarks I shall insert exactly what transpired concerning the bill—that I then suggested that this would be a cheaper way to finance the proposition than having some one later come to Congress for an appropriation. I state this merely to keep the record straight in that respect. This bill was objected to on December 18, 1922. I quote from page 637 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for that day, as follows:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.
Mr. BLANTON. If they are not going to ask the Federal Government for help—which would be a departure from the usual custom—and if by section 2 they can sell these coins at a premium of 50 cents or a dollar and thereby secure funds——

* * * * * * *

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, yes; I will yield to a Senator at any time. [Laughter.]

* * * * * * *

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Vermont will not object, holding the views that he does.
Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.
The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.
Mr. TREADWAY. I object.
The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. VESTAL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent, the bill H. R. 13194, of similar title, was ordered to lie on the table.

CHANGING GRADE AND PERCENTAGES OF ENLISTED MEN, UNITED STATES ARMY.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 4037) to amend the grade percentages of enlisted men as prescribed in section 4b of the national defense act, as amended.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this bill entails an additional obligation upon the Treasury amounting to a million and a half dollars. I think it is too important to consider on the Unanimous-Consent Calendar.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to take up the time of the House in explaining this measure if, after the explanation, the bill is going to be objected to. This is an important measure, and it involves not to exceed $1,500,000, I say frankly to the gentleman from Wisconsin, but it is a matter involving the efficiency of the tactical organization of the Army.

Mr. STAFFORD. Perhaps it will be agreeable to have the matter go over for two weeks?

Mr. McKENZIE. I could not consent to that, for this reason: Under the law reducing the Army to 125,000 men it became necessary to demote and eliminate a great many of the officers now holding these various positions in the various grades. That was to be effective on the 31st day of December. I do not know whether it has been put into effect or not, but evidently it will be very soon, and in the interest of good government and efficient organization, if we are going to pass this bill at all, we ought to pass it now. If we are not going to pass it, it will be up to the Army to do the best it can without it, and I can see no good reason for asking to delay the measure.

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill, as I have the figures before me—and if I am in error I would like to have the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE], who reported the bill, correct me—provides for 734 more noncommissioned officers of the three higher grades than are authorized in existing law upon the basis of an Army of 280,000 men.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. I do not know where he gets those figures.

Mr STAFFORD. I was in error by saying "based on an Army of 280,000 men." I should correct that by saying of the men that were in those classes on June 30, 1922.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman is entirely mistaken about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let me see whether I am mistaken, and if I am in error I wish to be corrected. The gentleman says that this bill is important. I agree with him. I take it it is too important to be considered on Unanimous-Consent Calendar, and should not be considered under suspension of the rules, because no opportunity would be given to amend the law, and it should be amended. What are the figures as given to me by a member of the Army staff?

On June 30, 1922, in the first grade of enlisted noncommissioned officers, master sergeants they are called, there were 1,277 men; in the second grade, technical or first sergeants, 3,129 men; in the third grade, staff sergeants, 2,663 men—a total of 7,069 men. If I am in error as to those figures I wish to be corrected, because upon that I base my statement. Under this bill it is proposed to have 992 in the first grade, 2,582 in the second grade, 4,229 in the third grade, or a total of 7,803. If I am in error as to that statement, that this bill will provide more of these noncommissioned officers in these three higher grades than they had in the service on June 30 last, I wish to be corrected.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. I am seeking information or a correction of any error that I may be laboring under.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The way the gentleman phrased it I thought he intended it to be an argument.

Mr. STAFFORD. I intended it to be both a question and an argument. I am appealing to the open mind of the Members of the House.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman is doing it well; he is building it up with something that they do not need to consider if they pass on the merits of the bill. That is why I want to see if we can not get an idea in here that is not contemplated in the gentleman's argument. The fact is that this bill is not based on any proposition for the tactical organization of the Army, in numbers, for field strength or operation, either the present existing force or one that may be contemplated. These men in the noncommissioned offices of higher grades, like the commissioned officers, are not grouped by numbers fitting to the tactical organization now existing in the Army but for the special work that the Army is required as a military institution to do throughout the country at large in conducting that part of the plans for national defense and popular instruction in military science not related to the mere tactical organization of any army in garrison or in the field.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am still waiting for some explanation.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is the explanation.

Mr. STAFFORD. These numbers as provided in this bill would increase the three higher classes by over 700.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Those numbers do not relate to the strength of the Army. The policy is entirely different.

Mr. McKENZIE. I think I can make plain to the gentleman from Wisconsin that under the Army reorganization law we provided for certain grades in the Army and that there should be a certain percentage of noncommissioned officers in the various grades. When we passed that law we provided that the maximum enlisted strength of the Army should not exceed 280,000. The Secretary of War held that the language was not a limitation, but it was mandatory, and he began immediately to have the Army enlisted up to the full authorized strength of 280,000, which was not the intent of Congress; but the Army, in order to carry out that program, promoted into these various grades numbers of officers far in excess of what we have at the present time or what is contemplated by this bill. Then Congress took action and provided that we should not enlist beyond 175,000 men. When that act was passed by Congress the War Department immediately ceased promoting noncommissioned officers into these various grades. Then we cut the Army to 150,000. Then we cut it down again to 125,000, in which the gentleman from Wisconsin was very largely instrumental and exercised a good deal of influence in his argument—as I say, we cut the Army to 125,000. Now, to carry out the percentages provided for in the original act we would have had perhaps a sufficient number of noncommissioned officers to handle the technical force, to take care of the ordnance depots, to take care of the flying machines and air service, to take care of the Signal Corps, and furnish the necessary noncommissioned officers of the several grades to go into the schools of the country and——

Mr. FIELDS. And for the National Guard.

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes; for the National Guard. But, as my colleague from Vermont said, to bring those percentages down exactly to what it would have been for the Army of 125,000 is to my mind ruinous to the Army, not only so far as the Army is concerned but to the schools where we send these young men of higher grades than the fourth. The great increase in this bill is in the third grade. As the gentleman well knows, in the first grade we have more noncommissioned officers now in this grade than this bill will provide for. This bill will require the demotion of 680 men, and in doing this I can not help but think of the Navy in comparison when we permit them to have their thousands in those grades.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why the necessity for increasing the three higher grades to nearly 750 more than what was in the service June 30 last before there became effective the limitation of 125,000 men in the Army?

Mr. McKENZIE. Those officers were in the service.

Mr. STAFFORD. In lower grades, it is true.

Mr. McKENZIE. No; in these higher grades.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman does not challenge the statement I made on which I predicate my argument, and I again repeat that on June 30—not July 1—1922, before the enlisted strength of 125,000 became effective, there were in the master sergeant's grade 1,277. There were in the second or technical or first sergeants' grade 3,129. There were in the third or staff sergeants' grade 2,663, or a total of 7,069. I hope my mathematics are correct. Now, you are proposing by this bill in those three grades a total number of 7,803, and I want to have some explanation of increasing this force by nearly 750.

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not know where the gentleman got his figures. But there is one thing certain this bill does not increase the noncommissioned officers in the Army but is a decrease in the number.

Mr. STAFFORD. It does increase the numbers of these three higher grades.

Mr. McKENZIE. Here is where the gentleman is disturbed and confused. Under the percentage basis in the Army reorganization law it is true there would be an excess, but the fact is we commissioned these men, they have been promoted, they are now being carried as surplus and have been carried as surplus.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; that is no explanation at all. That is not the fact and the gentleman can not escape the logic of my figures furnished to me by an officer of the Army Staff that on June 30 in these three higher grades there were 7,069, and under the bill as proposed, according to the gentleman's report, there will be 7,803, or nearly 800 more men in those higher grades at much higher salaries than now being paid.

Mr. McKENZIE. I will admit to the gentleman from Wisconsin that there will be an increase in the three higher grades by adopting the percentages provided for in this bill over the old percentages, but there will not be an increase in the number of officers now in these grades.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is challenging the figures that were furnished me by an officer of the General Staff. If I am not correct in the statement I have made I am not at fault. If I am in error I want to be corrected. I am acting in good faith, in absolute good faith. I am accepting the figures furnished me by the Army Staff. I suggest that the gentleman ask that the bill be passed for a few minutes and that in the meantime he call up the Army Staff and find out the facts. If I am in error I will withdraw my opposition. Nothing could be fairer than that.

Mr. McKENZIE. Have you the report there?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have the statistical report.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman does not wish to move that it be passed over, I will have to object.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the gentleman wants to object I will leave it up to him. It is his responsibility.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

EXTENSION OF JURISDICTION OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13459) extending the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission and making available funds appropriated under authority of an act entitled "An act to provide for the control of the floods of the Mississippi River and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1917, for the purpose of controlling the floods of the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Ohio River to Rock Island, Ill., and for the purpose of controlling the floods of the tributaries of the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Ohio River and Rock Island, Ill., including levee protection and bank protection, in so far as said tributaries are affected by the flood waters of the Mississippi River.

The title of the bill was read.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

AUDITOR AND DEPUTY AUDITOR, PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 3617) to fix the salaries of the auditor and deputy auditor of the Philippine Islands.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think we should not at this time, at least not to-day, increase the permanent salaries of these officers. I ask unanimous consent that this bill go over for two weeks without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimouse consent that this bill be passed over for two weeks without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CLERKS TO MEMBERS OF CONGRESS AND DELEGATES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the resolution (H. J. Res. 16) providing for pay to clerks to Members of Congress and Delegates.

The title of the resolution was read.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, can we have this resolution reported?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 16) providing for pay to clerks to Members of Congress and Delegates.

Resolved, etc., That hereafter appropriations made by Congress for clerk hire for Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners shall be paid by the Clerk of the House of Representatives to one or two persons to be designated by each Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner, the names of such persons to be placed upon the roll of employees of the House of Representatives, together with the amount to be paid each; and Representatives, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners elect to Congress shall likewise be entitled to make such designations: Provided, That such persons shall be subject to removal at any time by such Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner with or without cause.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. In what respect does this change the present law?

Mr. IRELAND. It makes no change whatever. I believe I have the floor, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. IRELAND. It simply makes permanent law out of the present arrangement. Through an error in drawing the original bill passed in the Sixty-sixth Congress the present arrangement was not made permanent law. It simply continues in effect our present arrangement without any possibility of its being deviated from in the future or the necessity of a new bill being brought in covering the subject.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, if this becomes permanent law and, say, there is a death among any of the clerks or employees, would this be placing him on the roll permanently? Would this pay the usual six months' salary to his relatives and the $250 funeral expenses?

Mr. IRELAND. If I may anticipate his thought, I think the gentleman is under a misapprehension, because that already obtains. This would not in any way affect that.

Mr. BLANTON. But it makes it permanent law?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. It does not change their present remuneration in any way?

Mr. IRELAND. No.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. This would simply avoid the necessity of passing upon this same question time after time and year after year, making it permanent?

Mr. IRELAND. That very tersely and exactly expresses the situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. IRELAND, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

BRIDGE ACROSS LITTLE CALUMET RIVER, ILL.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 4031) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Little Calumet River, in Cook County, State of Illinois, at or near the village of Riverdale, in said county.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the State of Illinois, the county of Cook, or the city of Chicago, separately or jointly, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Little Calumet River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near the village of Riverdale, in Cook County, Ill., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

BRIDGE ACROSS KANKAKEE RIVER, ILL.

Dak.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I wish to direct attention to the fact that under the phraseology of this bill the bridge will have to be erected at a point exactly 2½ miles north of the mouth of said river. I assume that that is not intended, but that it is intended to authorize the construction of a bridge at any convenient near-by point. So if it meets with the approval of the author of the bill or of the committee, I move to insert the word "about" after the word "point."

Mr. MILLER. "At or near."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, my attention is called to the fact that the Senate bill S. 4131, which has been messaged over to the House, contains the exact phraseology that I have suggested, and therefore I withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent to substitute S. 4131 and consider it in the place of H. R. 13000.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to substitute the Senate bill S. 4131 for the House bill H. R. 13000. Is there objection?

The clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill S. 4133, which passed the Senate December 22, be substituted for this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that the Senate bill be substituted for the House bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the State of North Dakota and the State of Minnesota, the county of Pembina, N. Dak., and the county of Kittson, Minn., or any one of them, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Red River of the North at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near the city of Pembina, N. Dak., and that the time for the commencement and completion of such bridge, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, shall be commenced within one year and completed within three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, in order to make the bill conform to the report made by the House committee, I move to amend by eliminating the word "one" where it appears in the phrase "or any one of them."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, strike out the word "one."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, a similar change should be made in the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended to conform to the amendment adopted to the text.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. BURTNESS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SAGINAW, SWAN CREEK, AND BLACK RIVER BAND OF CHIPPEWA INDIANS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 3184) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of the Saginaw, Swan Creek, and Black River Band of Chippewa Indians in the State of Michigan, and for other purposes," approved June 25, 1910.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I think the House should have some information as to this bill, and particularly as to the reason why the claims have not been prosecuted in the Court of Claims before this. As I read the bill and the report, it increases the maximum that they may be allowed for attorney fees.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, as I am going to object, I will object now.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Texas to reserve his objection for a moment.

Mr. BLANTON. I have no objection to the gentleman's asking to retain the bill in its place on the calendar.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I would like to give the House some information in regard to it.

Mr. BLANTON. I took it for granted that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] was going to object.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not say that I was going to object.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, Mr. Sepaker, I will reserve the objection.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, the information which the gentleman from Wisconsin wishes I think I can supply. These Indians which this bill seeks to relieve are residents of my district, and I know the circumstances very well. I will say that since the act of 1910 was passed they have been trying to find some competent Indian attorney who would take the case on the terms offered in the bill, which was a maximum fee of $10,000, but were unable to do so. We have had a long conference with the Indian Affairs Commissioner, who has agreed to the provisions of the bill as presented here. The bill as it is written provides that the claim must be filed within three years. Further, the bill permits the Court of Claims to fix the amount to be paid to the attorneys in the case, but limits it in any event to $25,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. How many of these Indians still survive?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Several hundred.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do they live in tribal relations?

Mr. WOODRUFF. No; they are all law-abiding, self-respecting citizens of the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the nature of their claims?

Mr. WOODRUFF. The claims arose when they lived under tribal relations.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the nature of the claims?

Mr. WOODRUFF. It is for the nonfulfillment of contracts entered into with the United States Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the total amount of the claims?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I do not know.

Mr. STAFFORD. It would amount to more than $250,000?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I should think it would be very much more than that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Have they any other claims against the Government?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. STAFFORD. These old, musty claims should not be revived; but if they have any real claims against the Government, they ought to be given an opportunity to establish them.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I quite agree with the gentleman, and for that reason introduced this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the statement of the gentleman from Michigan that they were unable to get a competent attorney to look after their rights is a satisfactory explanation in answer to my inquiry, and I withdraw my reservation of an objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the act of June 25, 1910, entitled "An act for the relief of the Saginaw, Swan Creek, and Black River Band of Chippewa Indians in the State of Michigan, and for other purposes," be, and hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That upon the final determination of such suit or suits the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to decree the fees to be paid to the attorney or attorneys employed by the Saginaw, Swan Creek, and Black River Band of Chippewa Indians, and the same shall be paid out of any sum or sums found due the said band of Indians."

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all of section 2 of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That any suit or suits under this act shall be begun within three years after passage hereof by the filing of a petition to be verified by the attorney or attorneys employed by the claimant Indians under contract approved by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in accordance with existing law. The compensation to be paid such attorney or attorneys shall be determined by the Court of Claims and shall not exceed the sum of 10 per cent of the amount of the judgment recovered, and in no event shall such fee or fees exceed the sum of $25,000, and the same shall be paid out of any sum or sums found to be due the Indians."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS, STATE OF INDIANA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8573) to create two judicial districts within the State of Indiana, the establishment of judicial divisions therein, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STEVENSON. Reserving the right to object, it seems to me that as we have just had a reorganization of the judicial districts of the country and added some 25 judges, I do not understand if this was a pressing case why it was not provided for in that instance. I should like to look into the matter if the gentleman will let it go over until the next unanimous-consent day.

Mr. HICKEY. Mr. Speaker, I think after the gentleman hears the explanation he will not object to it. The reason this was not included in the Walsh bill was in order that we might establish a judicial code, so to speak, for the State of Indiana, have the State divided into districts and also into divisions. It was felt that to include this bill in the regular bill might possibly complicate the matter to some extent. At this time Indiana has but one judge and one judicial district. Its population is about 3,000,000 people. It is the tenth largest State in point of population in the United States and the eleventh so far as resources are concerned. It is a State with a great many railroads. Nearly every railroad that enters Chicago from the East crosses its surface. Under the present system, established in 1838, we have but one judge and one district.

The people residing in the northern part of the State, which is densely populated, and which has a large number of industrial concerns and a great many interests of various kinds, must go to Indianapolis, a distance of more than 150 miles, with all of their litigation, whether it be important or trivial. The purpose of this bill is to correct that situation. I also call his attention, and the attention of the Members of the House, to the fact that other States have been amply provided for, including the State of the gentleman from South Carolina, with judicial facilities. In his State, which has a population of 1,683,724, there are two judges and two districts. In Alabama, with a population of 2,384,174, there are three judges and three districts, and I might go on and enumerate in each State the provisions that have been made to take care of the Federal business of the State. Taking the northern part of Indiana, I call attention to the fact that located there are the great steel industries, the Studebaker automobile manufacturing concern, the Oliver Chill Plow Co., and other large interests. In a very small territory we have more than 600,000 population, which is two districts.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman explain why this additional judge was not included in the judges bill that we passed at the last session of Congress?

Mr. HICKEY. Yes; because the additional judge would do us no good unless we had the State divided into districts and divisions. We would then be compelled, as we are now, to go to Indianapolis with all of our Federal law matters.

Mr. TILSON. Was Indiana put in as one of the States that needed an additional judge?

Mr. HICKEY. Indiana was not included in that bill, but this bill was considered by Mr. WALSH, as chairman of the subcommittee, who had charge of the other bill, and was considered by the judicial committee, and a unanimous report was made to this House after the passage of the other bill.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKEY. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Is the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOORES] in favor of this bill?

Mr. HICKEY. Mr. MOORES, I dare say, is opposed to the bill. He lives in Indianapolis, and I dare say he is opposed to the bill.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It seems to me that he ought to be here when the bill is considered.

Mr. HICKEY. The bill has been on the calendar for some time.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. He has just left the Foreign Affairs Committee. I have been trying to find out where he is. I think the gentleman better ask to have the bill go over without prejudice, else I shall have to object.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is the situation which I mean. I do not care anything about it myself, but I ask not to let it be passed because the gentleman wanted to be heard about it. I have no objection to the bill being passed over without prejudice, but unless that can be done I shall object to its consideration.

Mr. HICKEY. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to pass the bill over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BOARD OF REGENTS, SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was S. J. Res. 258, providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate joint resolution?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask some member of the Committee on the Library who Mr. Irwin B. Laughlin is, whom it is intended to appoint in place of the late Alexander Graham Bell. As no one seems to be here from that committee, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PUNISHMENT OF ASSAULT ON MAIL CARRIERS.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice in examining the statute which was in force before the amendments of May 18, 1915, and July 28, 1916, which this bill seeks to reincorporate, that instead of its being "shall willfully or maliciously assault" it was "and maliciously assault." There is a great difference in respect to the crime of assault, if it be willful without cause or provocation, and if it be willful and malicious. Can any gentleman from the Committee on the Post Office furnish some information as to whether that is intentional or not?

I hear no response, and under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the city of St. Paul, Minn., and its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Mississippi River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near the point where Robert Street, in said city of St. Paul, crosses the Mississippi River, in the county of Ramsey, in the State of Minnesota, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SETTING ASIDE CERTAIN LANDS, QUINAULT INDIAN RESERVATION, WASH., FOR LIGHTHOUSE PURPOSES.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11475) to authorize the setting aside of certain tribal lands within the Quinault Indian Reservation in Washington for lighthouse purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to this bill being considered, but do not waive the right to have it considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman wishes this considered in the Committee of the Whole House? Is there objection to the consideration of this bill in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11475, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11475, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11475) to authorize the setting aside of certain tribal lands within the Quinault Indian Reservation in Washington for lighthouse purposes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I demand recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for one hour.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Maryland rise?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety gentlemen are present——

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I move that the committee rise, and on that I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers (Mr. SANDERS of Indiana and Mr. LINTHICUM) reported that there were—ayes 2, noes 102. So the committee refused to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum of the committee is present.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee——

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise for information. I want to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield for that purpose?

Mr. HILL. Not until later.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would like to find out upon what this whole discussion is to be had.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair, that is not a parliamentary inquiry. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I shall be very glad to be interrupted for questions after presenting this matter to the House, but I should prefer not to yield until after I have gone over the matters which I wish to present to you.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the reverend and learned Cotton Mather, D. D., writing the church history of New England in 1696, made some observations which are very pertinent and relevant to the situation existing at the present time in this House. Said he:

In the year 1654 a certain windmill in the low countries, whirling round with extraordinary violence, by reason of a violent storm then blowing, the stone at length by its rapid motion became so intensely hot as to fire the mill, from whence the flames, being dispersed by the high winds, did set a whole town on fire. But I can tell my reader that about 20 years before this there was a whole country in America like to be set on fire by the rapid motion of a windmill in the head of one particular man. * * * Who, being a preacher that had less light than fire in him, both by his own sad example, preached unto us the danger of that evil which the apostle mentions in Romans x:2. They have a zeal, but not according to knowledge.

Nearly 300 years after the events recorded by Doctor Mather, to be exact, on December 20, 1922, and again on January 9, 1923, the Hon. Mr. UPSHAW, of Georgia, a Member of this House, made certain charges against Members of this House, against Senators of the United States, against governors of the sovereign States, and others upon whom the responsibility of American government rests, the character of those charges being clearly described in the following words of the Columbia Sentinel, the paper of the late Senator Thomas E. Watson. I quote the exact words of an editorial in that paper as presented to this House last week. In an address by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW] these are the words of the late Senator Watson's editorial in his paper, the spirit of Senator Watson still speaking through that paper:

UPSHAW's advice to the men "higher up" is good sense, sound law, and wholesome honesty. If public officials themselves violate one of our laws, what right have they to jail the average man for committing the same sin?

Mr. UPSHAW's charge is not a mere exhortation to Christmas piety. It is a definite charge, and it is made as a definite charge, and it has gone throughout the whole United States as a charge that we Members of Congress violate the laws that we are sworn to defend. These charges, gentlemen of the House, are not charges which should be broadcasted over the United States unchallenged. The time has come, my colleagues, when we should consider the position of this House in reference to criticisms that are made throughout the Nation. Proper criticism is right; but we should resent criticism that is not based on facts. I repeat, gentlemen, these charges are not charges that should be broadcasted over the United States unchallenged. I might say in passing that I telephoned to the office of Mr. UPSHAW this morning and said I proposed to take up this matter as soon as possible.

On January 9 the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW] said here in this House concerning his charge of December 20:

When I made that innocent and well-intentioned little speech only 13 minutes long, I did not dream that it would carry its honest message in flaming headlines on the front page of nearly every great daily and country paper in America.

That is the estimation by the gentleman from Georgia of what he has done in his little 13-minute speech. And the gentleman from Georgia gloated over the fact that his "message in flaming headlines" had branded you and me, Members of this House, indiscriminately as hypocrites and violators of the laws made by this House for the Government of this Nation.

I wonder where the gentleman from Georgia got those words, "Message in flaming headlines"? Was he thinking of a flaming cross on a Mer Rouge (La.) hilltop?

They made me think of Cotton Mather's human windmill; and they made me think of other reflections of Cotton Mather relating to that same human windmill.

Cotton Mather said:

And that which increased in them the suspicion of his ill character was partly, indeed, his refusing to communicate with the church of Boston * * * which the New England reformers thought then would be to carry the matter as far beyond their sense as the vulgar translation has done to the text of Luke 15:8, where, instead of "everrit domum," she swept the house, it reads "evertit domem," or she overset it.

I think the gentleman from Georgia in trying to sweep the house of prohibition has helped to "overset it," for if, as he says, governors, Members of Congress, Senators, and other high officials deride the eighteenth amendment and violate the Volstead Act, certainly that shows that the American people, who elect these same high officials, consider the Volstead Act as a joke. If they did not, would they elect such law-violating officials?

So the gentleman from Georgia has raised an upsetting dilemma. If his flaming charges are true, the Volstead Act, being obsolete to the Nation's high officials, should be repealed. If his charges are not true, he should admit that with more zeal than knowledge he has branded you and me as lawbreakers.

But, in the words of Cotton Mather, I can tell my hearers that about 30 years ago the whole of America was likely to be set on fire by the rapid motion of a windmill in the head of one particular man, the Hon. Thomas E. Watson, of Georgia, a Member of this House. He made general charges against the Members of this House, which I read into the RECORD on December 30, 1922. The House found he had spoken with more zeal than knowledge and that his charges "constituted an unwarranted assault upon the honor and dignity of the House and that such publication has the unqualified disapproval of the House."

I ask your especial attention to this, because these words which I shall read to you are not the words of an exhorter calling you from the illicit practices which in his opinion are being pursued, but they are from a man who specifically charges that you Members of the House of Representatives violate the laws.

I have followed the Watson case in a resolution, which I shall read to you, as follows:

Whereas in a newspaper release of December 20, 1922, purporting to have been written by Hon. WILLIAM DAVID UPSHAW, of Georgia, a Member of the House of Representatives, the following charges appeared:

"The people—the plain people—have cumulative evidence"—

Evidence is not testimony. Evidence is that which convicts—

"that some of these 'conferring' governors and many other high officials do not practice the prohibition enforcement which they preach to others.

"Let these governors, led by the President and Vice President of the United States and all the Members of the Cabinet, walk out in the open and lift their hands before high heaven and take a new oath of allegiance to the whole Constitution and the American flag; let them sacredly declare that, regardless of what their tastes and practices have been, they will never again—

My colleagues, you can not take an oath never again to do a thing unless you admit you have previously done it—

they will never again—

And here is what you are charged with all through the headlines, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW] boasts, of every paper throughout this country in flaming messages of fire. Here is what you are charged with—

they will never again build up a bootlegger's barbarous business by drinking any form or any amount of illicit liquors—

There is such a thing in this world, thank heaven, at the present time, as legal and licit liquor, but this is about illicit liquor—at any dinner or any function or in any "ballroom or back alley." Let every Member of Congress and every United States Senator follow suit; and

Whereas the said Hon. WILLIAM DAVID UPSHAW, on December 20, 1922, reiterated the same on the floor of the House; and

Whereas, in a newspaper release, on January 9, 1923, reiterated the same day on the floor of the House, the following additional charges were made by the said Mr. UPSHAW:

"And as for Members of this House, God knows I find no pleasure in this disclosure, but the bright daughter of one of the best men in Congress said to me: 'We are with you. I wish you could stop liquor selling and drinking in this House Office Building.'"

And liquor selling is a violation of more than one law in the District of Columbia—

I wish you could stop liquor selling and drinking in this House Office Building.

In other words, that building, which has been erected by the Nation in order that we may do our work, is being slandered as being the temple of illicit buying and selling of liquor.

And here is a signed letter that says:

———————, a professional bootlegger, told me a year ago, "The House Office Building furnishes my best customers, and as long as those 'blankety-blanks'"—

My colleagues, he is referring to you and me. Those are the words of Brother UPSHAW, quoting his bootlegger, and not my words. Says Brother UPSHAW's bootlegger—

"as long as those 'blankety-blanks' keep buying I am going to keep on selling." I have reported him several times, but they let him pay a fine and he goes right back to bootlegging. He does nothing else.

We know the situation with reference to exhortation by the Representative from Georgia, but in every little church on Main Street, in every little hamlet in this country, that message has gone to tell the world that you Members of the House, whether you voted straight for prohibition and live straight for prohibition, are hypocrites and law violators.

I want to make the public statement right here that I have two daughters, but one of them is only 2 and the other one only 6, and neither one of my daughters made that statement to UPSHAW's bootlegger.

Then comes a quotation from the Columbia Sentinel, the late Senator Watson's paper, which shows the intent of these charges:

The Columbia Sentinel, the paper of the late Senator Thomas E. Watson, enjoying a national circulation, and now edited by the brilliant former secretary of Senator Watson, Grover C. Edmonson, says:

"UPSHAW's advice to the men 'higher up' is good sense, sound law, and wholesome honesty. If public officials themselves violate one of our laws, what right have they to jail the average man for committing the same sin?" And

"Whereas the publication of said chages, if untrue, are a grave wrong to this body, and if true, the responsibility should be placed where it belongs;

"Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee of the House be directed to investigate and report to the House whether said charges are true, and, if untrue, whether the said Hon. WILLIAM DAVID UPSHAW has violated the privileges of the House, and their recommendations relative to the same: Resolved further, That said Judiciary Committee have leave to sit during the sessions of the House, to send for persons and papers, to swear witnesses, and to compel their attendance."

Gentlemen, if these charges are true, the knell of prohibition has sounded, because it shows that the law is a joke. If these charges are not true, we should vindicate the honor of this House. I shall move the previous question on this resolution at the earliest possible occasion.

The gentleman from Georgia has called me the "wet nurse" of the House. I accept the title with gratitude. He has placed me in the class with that great protagonist of civilizaton—the wolf that suckled Romulos and Remus, and that has come down through the ages embalmed in bronze.

But as a Member of this House I esteem its honor more than bronzed fame; and so to-day I demand that the gentleman from Georgia prove his charges true or untrue before the Judiciary Committee. And in confidence I will say to you I have never had a drink, licit or illicit, with any member of the Judiciary Committee at any time in any place. [Applause and laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to set aside for lighthouse purposes lot 5 in section 13 and lot 1 in section 24, township 21 north, range 13 west, of Willamette meridian, within the Quinault Indian Reservation in Washington, containing a total of 43.20 acres: Provided, That the Secretary of Commerce shall pay the Indians therefor, from the appropriation for the general expenses of the Lighthouse Service for the fiscal year in which this reservation is made, such price for the lands set aside hereunder as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Commerce: Provided further, That the funds thus derived shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Indians of the Quinault Reservation and shall be subject to expenditure for their benefit in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may deem for their best interests.

SEC. 2. That there is hereby reserved for the use and benefit of the Indians of the Quinault Reservation in common all oil, gas, coal, or other minerals in the lands set aside hereunder for lighthouse purposes, and the right to prospect for and mine these commodities under such rules and regulations as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Commerce.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 7, after the word "Reservation," strike out the words "and shall be subject to expenditure for their benefit in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may deem for their best interests."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11475) to authorize the setting aside of certain tribal lands within the Quinault Indian Reservation in Washington for lighthouse purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. SNYDER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WEST FORK OF SOUTH BRANCH OF CHICAGO RIVER.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 3177) declaring a portion of the West Fork of the South Branch of the Chicago River, Cook County, Ill., to be a nonnavigable stream.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not intend to object to the bill, but I think there should be some explanation before it passes the objection stage, because of the importance of the bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I think this bill ought to be explained to the House. So far as I know, there is no opposition to it, but it is a very important proposition. I do not want to be prolix, or to take too much time with it, but I will state briefly what it is.

The Chicago River extends west from Lake Michigan about half a mile and then divides into two branches, one of which runs north and the other of which runs south. The South Branch runs south about three miles and a half and then divides into two branches. The West Branch runs west about 8 miles to a high divide that separates the waters of the Chicago River and the Des Plaines River, forming a sort of watershed there. Many, many years ago travelers coming up the Illinois River from Mississippi came up the Des Plaines River, and then carried their canoes, their furs, and other freight from one water pool to another, and finally got into the Chicago River over this old trail.

It was abandoned. The last travel over it that we know anything about was early in the last century. But for 150 years it was a pretty well marked trail. After that it degenerated into a sort of meandering watercourse that ran through the prairies with very little water in it for about 7 miles of length. Some years after it was abandoned two men, who owned land along its course, drained the swamp lands by constructing a drainage ditch along the line of this old watercourse, called the Ogden ditch. That was abandoned, and to-day in this part of the stream in some places you can hardly see the channel at all, and at other places the old channel is full of sewage which runs into it from the intersecting sewers. This makes places that breed disease, and this part of the river is of no account for navigation at all. Numerous committees of Congress have been out to look at it, and all have decided that it is not a navigable stream and is of no importance.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is a stream navigable until it is declared so?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Has this stream ever been declared navigable, or is it so by reason of some other facts?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The Supreme Court of Illinois, in a recent case, the Economy Light & Power Co. case, held that originally this branch of the river was navigable, and commented on the fact that fur traders and the voyageurs had, for 150 years, crossed that part of the country, because it was the most available way to get to the Mississippi River.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman will realize that with reference to a stream that is navigable there are certain public rights concerning which the whole people are interested.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Absolutely.

Mr. BLANTON. To declare a stream nonnavigable by Congress, if there were such rights as were valuable, would take away the rights from the people.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I understand, and there is no man in this House that is more insistent on water navigation than am I.

Mr. BLANTON. Is this stream the only source of carrying off and removing the sewage of that locality?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; if the local authorities could fill up the old watercourse they would construct intersecting sewers into the Chicago Drainage Canal, which runs 1,500 feet south and in a parallel course to this stream its entire length.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, knowing this was a somewhat important bill, and it being located in the center of the city of Chicago, sent a subcommittee there, consisting of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] and myself, to look into it. We held hearings in the Federal building for three days. We notified everybody, the State, the city, the sanitary district, and everybody concerned, and had extensive hearings, which have been printed. We have gone into the law as far as we can go. We satisfied ourselves about the facts. This stream is not navigable; it is of no importance as a navigable stream; it will never be of any importance, because near it is the sanitary district canal, 23 feet deep on the average, 250 feet broad, sufficient to carry all navigation that may at any time come up that river. So there is no reasonable objection to it. The State of Illinois, which ordinarily insists strenuously on keeping all streams intact, is not offering any particular objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not know anything about this stream; I do not know its width or its availability for redemption, as far as property rights are concerned; but suppose it could be filled up and reclaimed and become valuable property. As it is now, no one has any property rights concerning a navigable stream. If you remove that obstacle and declare it nonnavigable and it should be taken over and filled up and made valuable property, some people might get the benefit of it. That is what I had in mind.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. As a matter of fact, in some places you can step across it, and in some places you can hardly see that there is a channel. Every once in a while you find a pool of water which is largely a cesspool. There is not much of a stream. But it having been declared to be a navigable stream by the decision of the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois some action on the part of Congress will be necessary before the local laws will apply.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I have not read the hearings, but I would like to ask the gentleman if the people of Chicago object to it?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; this bill was introduced by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], and a similar bill was introduced in the House by Mr. MICHAELSON, a Representative from Illinois. We had all the representatives of the city, the sanitary district, and the State of Illinois before us, and there was no objection made to this particular proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Was notice given to the people?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It was, it was advertised in the papers; we had news articles in the papers; we sent letters to everybody who had ever written us about it; and we were extremely careful on that point because the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] and I both are, as you know, firm advocates of water transportation, and we are not going to do anything that is going to let a useful watercourse be filled up if we can help it.

Mr. STEPHENS. Who will own this property when it is declared nonnavigable and filled up?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Under the law of Illinois the rule is this: Where a stream is navigable and is abandoned as a navigable stream the abutting landowners acquire title to the middle of the thread of the old channel.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then the abutting landowners will receive the benefit of this?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. They will.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then they are particularly interested in it?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; we had no representations from any of them.

Mr. STEPHENS. Would it not benefit them to the extent of millions of dollars?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Let me explain. The movement comes from the city of Chicago. They propose to run Blue Island Avenue, which is one of the principal avenues of the city, right down over the line of this old ditch, clear through into the western part of the city toward a zoological garden, and to make a great highway of what to-day is a stinking, offensive stream that is of no value. The plan, the movement, seems to have originated in the authorities of the city of Chicago.

Mr. STEPHENS. Yet this land would not go to the city of Chicago?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The city will get it by condemnation proceedings.

Mr. STEPHENS. And it will have to pay the abutting property owners?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It is willing to do that.

Mr. STEPHENS. How much will that amount to?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not know. The land on either side of this old ditch is not improved very much at this time. People will not move in there and construct buildings or manufacturing institutions; and just what the land is worth, I do not know. However, the city of Chicago, by condemnation proceedings, will have to acquire the right of way. Sometimes the new road will be right in the middle of the old channel, and sometimes it will cut across corners, and so on; but the city of Chicago will have to pay for it, and the people of that city are willing to do that.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. In what portion of Chicago is this stream?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It is in the southwest section. It runs out toward the village of Des Plaines.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Does it connect up with the canal or the Chicago River?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes; in the south part of the city, down about Thirty-ninth Street, the Chicago River forks. The west fork runs in a southwesterly direction about 7 or 8 miles toward Des Plaines. For about a mile and a half west of the fork of the river the river might be used for some navigable purposes. At that point, a mile and a half west of the fork and extending south from the river to the Sanitary District Canal, is a collateral channel, as it is called, of the Sanitary District Canal, which has made a large loop of water there.

The people of Chicago wanted the committee to adopt an amendment which also provides for the abandonment of that portion of the river within the loop, but Mr. DENISON and I were unitedly opposed to that proposition, and when we reported it to the committee the committee agreed with us, so that the only portion involved is the portion west of the collateral channel, which is an old meandering ditch.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Does not the Des Plaines Canal, which I think ran from the Illinois River, connect with this branch?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The gentleman means the Illinois and Michigan Canal?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. No; the old Des Plaines Canal.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No. I never knew of any canal that connected the Des Plaines and Illinois Rivers.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. There was a canal called the Des Plaines Canal, and I thought that was the canal which connected the Chicago River with the Illinois River through Des Plaines.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the Illinois and Michigan Canal to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Along about 1848 a canal was dug from the Des Plaines River to the Chicago River called the Illinois and Michigan Canal, which was used for many years and finally abandoned when the railroads practically put a stop to its business.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. This is not the Des Plaines River?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; this is a branch of the Chicago River. The old bed of the Illinois and Michigan Canal still exists, still furnishes adequate terminal facilities if it was ever desired, and in addition to this there is the sanitary district and ship canal, which has a good depth of water and also parallels it within a short distance.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. This would not interfere with that canal?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Not in the least.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk reported the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all of that portion of the West Fork of the South Branch of the Chicago River, in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, extending west from the west line of the Collateral Channel of the sanitary district of Chicago, in the northwest quarter of section 36, township 39 north, range 13 east of the third principal meridian, be, and the same is hereby, declared to be a nonnavigable stream within the meaning of the Constitution and laws of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DENISON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INDIANS ON THE LAC COURTE OREILLE INDIAN RESERVATION IN WISCONSIN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13655) to validate certain allotments of land made to Indians on the Lac Courte Oreille Indian Reservation in Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am acquainted somewhat by general rumor and what comes from reading the papers of Milwaukee that years back there were allotments of Indian land in which there were large stands of timber made to Indians without right, which were appropriated by the so-called timber interests of the State. There have been some bills proposed to confirm those titles. I wish to know whether the bill sought is to confirm the title of allotted lands that were granted without right, where the poor Indian got little or nothing because he had no right to the land, and the lumberman who took his paper title and got possession and now wishes to have his title confirmed?

Mr. BURTNESS. The necessity and reason for the bill are that under the law passed in 1854, providing for allotments to the Indians, such allotments should only be made to heads of families or to single persons who were above the age of 21 years.

Pursuant to the provisions of that law, however, an allotting agent made allotments which were erroneous, or at least which were not justified under the provisions of that law in this, that he made some allotments to minors who were under the age of 21 years, and he also made some allotments to married women who were not the heads of families.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why did he violate the power which was vested in him to grant land, and very likely valuable timberland, to persons who were incompetent and could not dispose of their land? Then comes along some representative of lumber companies and buys this land for a mere pittance and sells the timber at full value, and now comes to the Government when the land has become valuable and asks confirmation of title.

Mr. BURTNESS. The information given by the bureau is that it was done through error, through inadvertence on the part of the allotting agent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any testimony to the effect it was done through inadvertence and error?

Mr. BURTNESS. That is the statement made by the assistant commissioner before the committee. Now, if the gentleman will permit me to finish my explanation, I want to make it plain to him and the House that the law passed in 1903 permitted allotments to be made to single persons under 21 years of age and to married women who might not be heads of families. In other words, the situation is this: If the erroneous allotment as made by the allotting agent under the provision of the 1854 act prior to 1903 had in effect been made at any time during the last 19 years, then there would be no question whatsoever as to the validity of the act of the allotting agent, so all that this legislation will do, if passed, is simply to cure it, to make the older allotments valid in the same way as if they had been made since the 1903 act went into effect.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under this act of 1903 the Indian agent was authorized to allot to married women. There the authority was bestowed. But in these old allotments there was no authority whatsoever. I want it clear in my mind it was not done by design to get these valuable Indian lands with rare white-pine timber into the possession of the lumber interests.

Mr. BURTNESS. But the fact is that ever since 1903 this very land could have been allotted and has been allotted, a great many of them, to married women who are not the heads of families and to minors under the age of 21 years.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under authority of law?

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes; passed in 1903, which was doubtless the intent at that time, for that was the policy that Congress established. And so the committee thought that such allotments as had been made erroneously prior to that time, but which, however, are in direct accord with the policy as outlined by Congress in the 1903 act, that there was no reason why such prior allotments should not be made valid, and therefore reported this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the reservation of the right to object.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman that after a very careful consideration of this bill we found that all it would do would simply be to correct an error which was made in these allotments when originally made, and there is really nobody being hurt or favored by it in any event, and we thought that the bill ought to be passed to clear up the situation.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That such allotments of land to Indians on the Lac Courte Oreille Indian Reservation in Wisconsin and the restricted fee patents issued therefor, under the provisions of article 3 of the treaty of September 30, 1854 (10 Stat. L., p. 1109), which allotments are not within the provisions of the treaty because of the ages of the allottees or their status as heads of families at the time the allotments were made, be, and the same are hereby, validated.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURTNESS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LANDS DEVISED TO THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT BY THE LATE JOSEPH BATTELL, OF MIDDLEBURY, VT.

The next business in order on the Unanimous Consent Calendar was the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 30) concerning lands devised to the United States Government by the late Joseph Battell, of Middlebury, Vt.

The Clerk read the title of the concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not recall whether this particular question has been presented to the Speaker for decision or not, where a person by will offers land to the Government under certain conditions and the Congress decides not to accept the gift, whether it should be by joint resolution rather than by concurrent resolution. I wish to call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that this is a Senate concurrent resolution. I have given some little thought to it. I am of the opinion that this should be a joint resolution that should be presented to the President for his approval. True the Government has no title to-day to the land. It has not even an inchoate interest, and yet it would have title if the Government should pass a law accepting the land upon the terms provided in the will of the testator. I think in a matter of that kind the question is legislative in its character and should be submitted to the President of the United States for approval. It is not of the relationship of matters between the two Houses, wherein the President is not interested, which are generally embodied in a concurrent resolution.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. May I offer a suggestion?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly. I am seeking enlightenment. I was asking whether it should not be submitted to the President instead of being embodied in a concurrent resolution. I am not objecting to the merits of the provision. I think the grant should be rejected.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would make any difference what you call the resolution, whether concurrent or joint. A concurrent resolution, if it contains legislation, as I understand it, goes to the President. I have very hurriedly looked up the matter, and in the Manual, section 389, it is stated—

A concurrent resolution is binding upon neither House until agreed to by both. It is not sent to the President for approval unless it contain a proposition of legislation which is not within the scope of the modern form of concurrent resolution.

Now, if it is held that it contains a proposition of legislation it would necessarily go to the President under this citation.

The SPEAKER. If it requires the President's signature, why should it not be a joint resolution?

Mr. SINNOTT. It does not make much difference what you call it.

The SPEAKER. A joint resolution requires the President's signature.

Mr. SINNOTT. A concurrent resolution requires the signature of the President if it contains a proposition of legislation. However, it seems to me that this is not a proper parliamentary objection at this time to the measure. It is a criticism, but not an objection that the Chair can entertain.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes; the enacting clause would have to be changed. I have never known a concurrent resolution to pass either House that was submitted to the President. Concurrent resolutions are intended to be limited in purpose to the action of the two bodies. If the author of the resolution in another body has made a mistake, let us have the courage to admit that he has done so. I have said to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] that I had no objection on the merits of the resolution.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does the gentleman propose to arrest this measure entirely? You can not amend a thing of this nature in parliamentary process now. It means the reintroduction of this resolution from the other end again.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman can introduce a House resolution.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me, I do not pretend to be versed enough in parliamentary procedure to make a fine argument on the relative value of a concurrent and a joint resolution and the action of Congress upon them. This is not a case where Congress is being asked to make a law in the sense that it is to be followed as a rule and guide for the action of anybody, and therefore needs the approval of the President to make it a law.

It is a case where the court merely refused to distribute some property to the residuary legatee until the two Chambers of Congress themselves had decided whether they want to pass a law accepting the bequest or not. The history of this thing shows plainly what they had in mind. The Senate resolution was originally acted upon by the Senate committee and reported by the committee adversely, whereupon the measure was changed; that it was the sense of Congress that it did not want to accept the gift.

Mr. STAFFORD. But Congress should have the right to pass upon whether that gift should be accepted or not. It is a legislative enactment.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It was in the form of a resolution to show the intent of the two Houses, and not what the two Houses with the signature of the President would put into effect. It is negative.

The SPEAKER. It is clear to the Chair that the action must be the action of the United States Government, of which the President is a part, and that he is just as much entitled to be heard on it as Congress. The Chair thinks at first blush that it ought to be a joint resolution; and the Chair would suggest, although it is a rather awkward way to do it, that he does not see why a concurrent resolution could not be amended into a joint resolution.

Mr. STAFFORD. I move, Mr. Speaker, as a substitute the following. I withdraw the reservation of an objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. I move as a substitute the following: After the preamble, insert in lieu of the resolving clause the following: "Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the acceptance of said devise," and so forth, providing the enacting phraseology which always accompanies a joint resoluton, as distinguished from a concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 30.

Whereas Joseph Battell, late of Middlebury, county of Addison, State of Vermont, deceased, in and by his last will and testament devised to the Government of the United States of America about 3,900 acres of land situated in the towns of Lincoln and Warren, in the State of Vermont, for a national park; and

Whereas said lands were devised to the United States of America upon certain conditions, among which were the following: That the Government should construct and maintain suitable roads and buildings upon the land constituting such national park for the use and accommodation of visitors to such park, and should employ suitable caretakers to the end and purpose that the woodland should be properly cared for and preserved so far as possible in its primitive beauty; and

Whereas it is deemed inexpedient to accept said devise and to establish a national park in accordance with the terms thereof: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the acceptance of said devise so made by Joseph Battell in his last will and testament be declined by the Government of the United States, and that the estate of the said Joseph Battell be forever discharged from any obligation to the United States growing out of the devise before mentioned.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Clerk has not yet reported the amendment. I offer as a substitute, Mr. Speaker, the following: "Strike out of the title the word "concurrent" and substitute the word "joint," so as to make it a joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Strike out of the title "Concurrent Resolution No. 30" and insert "Joint Resolution No. —."

Mr. STAFFORD. And also in the title substitute "joint" for "concurrent." And for the resolving phraseology substitute the usual phraseology which accompanies a joint resolution as follows: "Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled," in lieu of the "the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring)."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Strike out in the caption at the head of the preamble the word "concurrent" and insert in lieu thereof the word "joint," and in the resolving clause strike out "Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring)," and insert——

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert: "Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled" in lieu of "the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring)."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this is the first time since I have been in Congress that the Government has turned down a gift from anybody.

Mr. SINNOTT. A white elephant.

Mr. BLANTON. Here is a man in Vermont who offered to the Government 3,900 acres of valuable land, and I am glad to commend the Senate of the United States for not accepting it. It was not land that was suitable for a national park, although the owner offered it for that purpose. But he expected the United States Government, if it accepted it, to maintain it as a national park, with roadways and caretakers and the annual expenses incident to all national parks. Every few days we hear of some charitably minded person wanting to give something to the United States. We ought to scrutinize such gifts carefully. There are some gifts that an individual can not afford to take. There are some gifts that a Government can not afford to take.

I notice that another charitably minded individual, who has passed away lately, has offered property for establishing what he calls a summer White House somewhere else than in Washington. There should be but one White House in this Government of ours, and that is here in Washington. There is too much growing tendency to create aristocracies and to follow the example set up by royalty in other countries, by monarchies in other countries. Certain people would have a summer White House in the North, and an autumn White House somewhere else, and a winter White House in Florida. It is following European example a little too much. I am against it all, and I believe the people of this country want a little more simplicity in the manner of their living, beginning with the Chief Officer of the land.

When we consider the estimates of expenses appearing in a divorce court in New York as to what one separated wife and children need for their annual expenses, which the court is asked to set aside to them each year, it is a shock to American institutions, I do not care how wealthy a person may be. The waste of their property along such lines is not according to American ideals.

Last Saturday this grass widow requested a court of equity to make her an annual allowance out of her husband's estate for the following expenses each year, to wit:

Apartment rent, $13,000; certain employees, $500; trained nurse, $2,100; cook, $1,500; kitchen maid, $720; housemaid, $900; two laundresses, $1,800; butler, $1,800; for cleaning apartment, $520; personal maid, $900; cost of food, $16,500; for maintaining motor car, $5,300; tutors for two boys, $3,000; secretary, $3,000; clothing for two sons, $4,500; clothing for self, $15,000; maintaining summer place, $9,600; traveling expenses during summer, $15,000; incidental expenses, such as stamps, car fare, and so forth, $5,000; doctor bills, $6,000; dentist bills, $4,000; amusements, books, and concerts, $3,500; toys, gifts, birthday and Christmas presents, $1,000; insurance, $1,500; furniture, $10,000; son's vacation expenses, $3,000, and extra tutoring, $1,500; contributions, $3,000; and gratuities, $5,000.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DENISON. Under the custom which has grown up our White House now is quite a public place, and the public object to its being closed or even to the grounds being closed. It is always open to tourists, and there is very litte opportunity for that quiet and rest that the President ought to have. What objection has the gentleman from Texas to the President, like other people, having an opportunity to have a quiet place where he can take his family and get some rest during certain months of the year?

Mr. BLANTON. There is no such thing as rest for the President of the United States, I do not care whether it is in a White House in Florida, or in Maine, or in the White House in Washington. But there is seclusion for him. Of all the many visitors who go to the White House each day very few see the President. The President never sees them. Of course he sees some by appointment, but he rarely ever sees the great hordes of visitors who enter the doors of the White House. He is never bothered by them.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a minute. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], who is an active Member of this House and who takes an interest in all its proceedings, will study the history of the constant increase in appropriations for the Chief Executive of this Nation, an increase that has been growing not only under Republican administrations but under Democratic administrations as well—if the gentleman will look back 50 years he will be astounded. It ought not to be carried too far. The Chief Executive of this Nation is the chief of the greatest Republic in the world and represents the finest people in the world, but he is not a monarch. He is the executive officer of the American people. He is an American. We must not get away from that idea with all of its full significance.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DENISON. Of course it is not un-American—I am sure my friend from Texas will agree that it is not at all un-American—that the President of our country should be given an opportunity to have a quiet place where he can take his family and get a little rest. If we can give him that opportunity, does not the gentleman from Texas think that this is too great a Nation to quibble and dispute and quarrel over a little matter of that kind; and if we can do that for our President, does not the gentleman think we ought to do so?

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Illinois knows well that if we establish a summer White House away from Washington it will not be a year before there will be a move on foot to establish a winter White House down in Florida. The gentleman knows that.

Mr. DENISON. No; I do not know that.

Mr. BLANTON. Then he is not the discerning gentleman I thought he was. His discernment does not take in quite the scope I thought it did.

Mr. DENISON. I have not as much imagination as the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. No; the gentleman from Texas is looking upon facts based on past history. We are now spending $25,000 to equip the Mayflower with oil burners instead of coal, and there is a movement on foot now to buy for the Vice President of the United States a magnificent mansion out here on Sixteenth Street, in Mount Pleasant, that is now held there, vacant, waiting for Congress to buy it—to be called the Vice President's White House.

There is not a man in this Nation who appreciates more highly than I do the Vice President of this country. He is one of the biggest men in the Nation. There is only one thing that kept me from voting for him, and that is the fact that he is a Republican. If it had not been for his party affiliations I might have voted for him. But however much we admire him, we must draw the line against this drifting into what I call the Old World aristocracy that our forefathers ran away from when they established this American Republic. I want to say to the people who built that mansion out yonder on Sixteenth Street that if the rest of my colleagues think about it as I do they might just as well dispose of it in some other way, because we are not going to buy it.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman from Texas yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROSE. I think I know what the gentleman had in mind in speaking of the enormous allowance for expenses in a divorce suit in New York. Does the gentleman think that a wife asking 25 per cent of the admitted income of her husband is out of proportion?

Mr. BLANTON. No; if she asked for same as an estate to which she was entitled, if she asked for it as her part of the accumulations earned during marriage, it would be a different thing, for the benefit of herself and her child as their part of the estate, but she is asking merely for a yearly allowance to be spent along certain lines, enough to take care of a small village of needy citizens.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. The Vice President has no place to live in, and the gentleman knows——

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman from Illinois himself has none.

Mr. DENISON. No; but the gentleman from Illinois does not have the obligations and duties resting upon him that the Vice President has. His position makes it necessary for him to entertain, of course.

Mr. BLANTON. One minute, right there. There is no man holding office in our Government that has more social responsibility concerning entertaining than does the Secretary of State, and yet he is not furnished a White House by the Government to live in. It would be only a step further when you give a residence to the Vice President, you would also have to give one to the Secretary of State and then all down the line to every member of the Cabinet, and then to Senators and Congressmen.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman can appreciate the fact that there is some difference between the position and the duties of the Vice President and the Secretary of State. The Vice President is compelled to live in hotels, and the gentleman knows enough about hotels in Washington so that he ought to have some sympathy with a man in his position who is compelled to live in high-priced hotels in this city.

Mr. BLANTON. He is not compelled to live in hotels. He could rent a residence.

Mr. DENISON. For fear that the gentleman's expressed sentiments will be taken as the sentiment of the House that the Government ought not to furnish the Vice President with a home, I want to say that I hope the time will soon come when it will do so.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will have some of the citizens from each county in his district come here and let them see how during the past 30 years we have advanced in the way of expenses for both the Chief Executive and for the Vice President, and show them the palatial residences on Sixteenth Street and ask them if they are in favor of buying a residence of that kind for the Vice President, I will guarantee that the gentleman will change his mind. I merely wanted to raise my protest against this growing extravagance, and I only rose for that purpose and to commend the Senate for disapproving this gift and turning it back.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps under the circumstances it might not be improper for me to suggest that the man, Mr. Joseph Battell, who made this original bequest to the Government did so in the utmost good faith and in an attempt to carry out a project for the public benefit which had been one of the ideals of his dreams for many years. Mr. Battell was a man of considerable means and a man of great public spirit and enterprise. In this particular instance he was trying to give the Government of the United States a forest area or reservation for a public park right alongside and in the vicinity of other similar forest land that he had given to the State of Vermont, and which the State of Vermont had accepted. It appears, however, that the old gentleman attached to the gift to the United States such conditions as to acceptance and maintenance of this tract of land that would make it a kind of white elephant, perhaps, and not suitable for the purpose he had in mind, and not suitable for the similar purpose that the State might exercise in the property he had given it near by. So it was felt under the circumstances that, recognizing the practical necessities of the years that have followed his decease, it might not be altogether advisable for the Government to accept the gift notwithstanding the good intentions he had in mind in making his will.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. GREENE of Vermont, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the concurrent resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF PARILLO v. KUNZ.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of Elections Committee No. 1, I present a report in the contested-election case of Parillo against Kunz, eighth district of Illinois.

TO EXTEND THE PROVISIONS OF THE ACT OF FEBRUARY 8, 1887, TO LANDS PURCHASED BY THE INDIANS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill S. 1926, an act to extend the provisions of the act of February 8, 1887, as amended, to lands purchased for Indians.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object, I wish the gentleman from Arizona would give us some information about this bill.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to make applicable to lands heretofore or hereafter purchased by Indians the provisions of the general allotment act of 1887 as amended. Under the general allotment act any reservation created for Indians may be allotted not more than 160 acres of grazing land to any one Indian, not more than 100 acres of agricultural land, and not more then 40 acres of irrigated land. Certain tracts of land have been purchased for Indians, about 7,000 acres in California, about 14,000 acres in Wisconsin, and some other lands in Minnesota. The conditions surrounding these purchases are such that the lands could not be allotted, and the title to them remains in the tribe and in the United States. It is certainly good policy to divide up all tribal lands by alloting them to individual members of the tribe in order that they may have the benefits of controlling a particular piece of property and learn how to manage it, the same as any other citizen. If they are incompetent Indians they will be given trust patents, and their affairs will be handled in exactly the same way as is now done with respect to Indian lands.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, would not the gentleman let the matter pass over until the next unanimous consent day, to remain on the calendar? A number of these are in my district, and I have not heard from the folks at home in regard to the matter. I ask the gentleman to do that.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ROAD ON FORT APACHE INDIAN RESERVATION, ARIZ.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13128) authorizing an appropriation for the construction of a road within the Fort Apache Indian Reservation, Ariz.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized an appropriation of $15,000 from any tribal funds on deposit in the Treasury to the credit of the Indians of the Fort Apache Indian Reservation, Ariz., to be immediately available, to pay one-half the cost of constructing a wagon road within said reservation between Cooley and the northeast boundary of said reservation: Provided, That no part of the appropriation herein authorized shall be expended until the Secretary of the Interior shall have obtained from the proper authorities of the county of Apache, Ariz., satisfactory guaranties of the payment by said county of one-half of the cost of the construction of said road.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAYDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TO FILL VACANCY IN BOARD OF REGENTS, SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 425, Senate Joint Resolution 258, providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 425, Senate Joint Resolution 258, providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, when this resolution was first under consideration I sought information as to the gentleman recommended to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. Bell. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] was temporarily out of the Chamber. I understand from the statement furnished to me that it is necessary to take this matter up immediately, for the reason that there is to be a meeting of the Board of Regents on February 8; and as there is to be no further Unanimous-Consent Calendar day this month, I think there should be an exception made in this case. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to returning to this resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, in the class other than Members of Congress, caused by the expiration of the term of Alexander Graham Bell, of Washington, D. C., be filled by the appointment of Irwin B. Laughlin, of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FESS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS PEARL RIVER, MISS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 13139) granting the consent of Congress to the Great Southern Lumber Co., a corporation of the State of Pennsylvania doing business in the State of Mississippi, to construct a railroad bridge across Pearl River at approximately one and one-half miles north of Georgetown, in the State of Mississippi, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, let the bill be reported first, as it is not on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Great Southern Lumber Co., a corporation of the State of Pennsylvania doing business in the State of Mississippi, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge and approaches thereto across the Pearl River at approximately one and one-half miles north of Georgetown, in the State of Mississippi, and in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the construction of such bridge shall be commenced within three years from the date of the passage of this act, and shall be completed within five years from the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 1, after the word "at," insert the words "a point suitable to the interests of navigation."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FLOOD CONTROL OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the report from the Committee on Flood Control, on a bill which they have ordered to be reported, relating to the flood control of the Mississippi River, may be printed with illustrations.

Mr. MONDELL. What is the class of illustrations?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The illustrations consist of two maps. The plate was made by the Federal Barge Line, a Government corporation on the Mississippi River. It shows the destination of all the freight carried north on the barge line, and the other map shows the points of origin throughout the country of all the freight carried south on the barge line.

The plates are to be furnished free of charge and the Public Printer tells me that the additional cost will be about 2 cents apiece for the report. Under the law I think 1,340 reports have to be printed, so that the cost would be in the neighborhood of $30.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment so that I may ask the gentleman from Wyoming a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will withhold the point.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I ask the gentleman when he expects we will have an opportunity to take up the Private Calendar? There are now about 120 bills on that calendar.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope some time next week. I am very anxious that we shall have several days' consideration of the Private Calendar.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin withhold his point of no quorum?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I desire unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter from Commissioner Lissner of the Shipping Board in reference to the colloquy in the House the other day as to the edition printed of the so-called Government Aid to Merchant Shipping. Gentlemen will remember there was a colloquy here between the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the letter referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee is not here——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I looked around for him, and I have tried to find him.

Mr. BLANTON. Is this additional propaganda in behalf of the ship subsidy bill?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I am here, and I shall not make objection, but I would like to have an opportunity to cross-examine him on whatever he says.

Mr. BLANTON. Is this additional propaganda in behalf of the ship subsidy bill?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. No; it is merely a statement as to that edition to which reference was made in the discussion the other day.

Mr. BLANTON. It is not in furtherance of the passage of the ship subsidy bill?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. No.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, January 15, 1923.

Hon. CARL R. CHINDBLOM,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHINDBLOM: On January 12, 1923, Representative DAVIS of Tennessee (page 1691, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD) stated:

"I hold in my hand a document of 306 pages, a multigraphed document, and it is expensively bound.

"It costs much more than to have it printed, and I have a written memorandum furnished by an employee of the Shipping Board who is in a position to be familiar with the facts and who is entirely reliable, and he makes the statement that this document, which is simply propaganda and arguments in favor of a certain measure, was prepared in the Shipping Board and by officials and employees of the Shipping Board, and he makes the statement that over 217,000 of these documents were made in the Shipping Board and made out of material paid for by the Government and prepared and made up and distributed by officials in the Shipping Board who were receiving Government salaries. This was distributed throughout the country to newspapers, business organizations, and what not, and at what expense I do not know, but it is in regard to the preparation and distribution of this document that this same official says that 'our duplicating section was working on this issue for several weeks, holding up important work; some duplicating work in connection with the regular routine was laid up over three weeks. Mr. Lasker's orders were to give this pamphlet precedence over everything else.'"

You personally expressed some interest in that statement, and later on (page 1692, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD) Congressman EDMONDS stated that he had just received information from me that a thousand copies of the document referred to were all that were made by the Shipping Board, instead of 217,000 copies, as stated by Mr. DAVIS, and Mr. DAVIS questioned the accuracy of that statement and said:

"I said that I had a memorandum furnished by an employee of the Shipping Board in which he stated that that was the fact. He was in the section that issued it."

This statement, as reported by Mr. DAVIS, constitutes such a gross inaccuracy that I feel it my duty to give the facts in this letter, with the request that you ask to have the same printed as a part of the RECORD.

As you well know, the study that was put out under the title "Government Aid to Merchant Shipping," referred to by Mr. DAVIS, was initiated at the special request of the President addressed to Chairman Lasker, and was prepared after months of painstaking investigation by a committee of the best available experts, consisting principally of well-qualified men employed by the Shipping Board and high naval officers, with some advice from practical and professional men not in governmental employ.

It was gotten out in mimeograph form by the Shipping Board's duplicating division largely as a matter of practical convenience and time-saving and because it was being revised and perfected from time to time.

The first edition was limited to 50 copies and was completed January 21, 1922. A revised edition of 100 copies was completed on February 20, 1922; and the final document of 306 pages (referred to by Mr. DAVIS, of which, as stated, exactly 1,000 copies was printed), was completed March 28, 1922.

This large edition, as stated by Mr. EDMONDS, was gotten up especially so that each Member of Congress might be furnished a copy, which was done. As might have been expected, there were requests for copies immediately made by the press correspondents and some others entitled to same, which were gladly furnished, and the remainder of the edition, amounting to about 50 copies, we still have on hand.

Far from being "expensively bound," the document, as may easily be ascertained by a mere glance at it, is cheaply and roughly bound in paper.

The Shipping Board makes no apology for its actions in this matter in furnishing as quickly as possible to the Congress and to representatives of the leading press associations copies of a comprehensive and expert study as to the result of which there was at the time a great deal of justifiable interest, and which legislators and the country were entitled to be informed concerning at the earliest possible day.

It is true that our duplicating section was working on this issue of 1,000 copies off and on for several weeks and that some other routine work was laid aside at times during that period. Quite properly orders were given that this work should have the right of way over ordinary matters of routine that could be postponed without detriment to the service. In all about 10 days' solid time was put in by our duplicating force on the edition referred to. At this rate it would have taken about 2,170 working days, or about seven years, solid time to print the mythical 217,000 copies referred to by Mr. DAVIS and his informant.

Members of Congress may therefore judge whether the Shipping Board employee referred to is "entirely reliable" and a "trustworthy source of information." On our part, we think that any employee of the Government who would clandestinely give out such a mendacious statement and so willfully mislead a Member of Congress should be summarily dismissed, and we feel justified in requesting, through you, that Mr. DAVIS give us the name of the employee referred to and a copy of the memorandum furnished by the employee, so that the latter may be properly dealt with.

There seems to us to be only one possible alternative to this course on the part of Mr. DAVIS. It may well be that quite unintentionally he misinterpreted to the House the information that was given him by the employee, in which event we feel sure Mr. DAVIS will desire to make the correction himself on the floor.

Yours very sincerely,

MEYER LISSNER, Commissioner.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Major William E. Mr. WILLIS. I present resolutions adopted by the directors of the Steubenville (Ohio) Chamber of Commerce on December 18, 1922, relative to immigration questions, and ask that they be referred to the Committee on Immigration and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Immigration and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas in recent years laws have been enacted by the Congress of the United States to govern and regulate the immigration of aliens to this country, which action on the part of Congress was both wise and just since it was for the purpose of attempting to solve what had become known as the "Immigration problem"; and

Whereas these certain laws restricting immigration have been given a fair trial, and based upon actual experience of the operation and enforcement of these laws there are now being proposed many changes in these laws relating to immigration; and

Whereas the Steubenville Chamber of Commerce, an organization of more than 600 business men, professional men, and manufacturers of Steubenville, Ohio, has studied this immigration problem from its different angles and has given consideration to the merits of different changes of the present immigration laws now being proposed, many of such changes having already been drafted into the form of bills to be introduced into Congress: Therefore be it

Resolved, by the Steubenville Chamber of Commerce, based upon the unanimous action taken by 100 members present at a meeting on Wednesday, December 13, 1922, when this subject was very carefully considered, and based upon the indorsement of such action by the unanimous vote of the directors of this organization at a regular meeting December 18, 1922, that this organization go on record in favor of Senate bill 1253 introduced at the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress by Senator STERLING, which bill proposes the creation of an immigration board and amends present immigration laws by restricting immigration of aliens to such a number as would be absolutely required from an economic standpoint by this country, and further providing for the selection by representatives of the United States at point of embarkation of immigrants so that only such immigrants as are needed and can be assimilated by this country will be admitted to these borders. And be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the United States Senators from Ohio and also to Congressman FRANK MURPHY, and we most respectfully urge their support in helping to bring about the passage of this law.

CERTIFICATION.

This is to certify that the above is a true and correct copy of a resolution adopted by the directors of the Steubenville Chamber of Commerce in regular meeting Monday, December 18, 1922.

C. O. HANES, Secretary.

Mr. STERLING. I have received a number of telegrams from banks and loan associations in my State relative to Title IV of the pending bill (S. 4280) to provide credit facilities for the agriculture and live-stock interests of the United States, and so forth, asking that the limit of loans which may be made by Federal land banks may be increased to $25,000. I ask that the first telegram be read and that the names of the senders of the other telegrams may be printed in the RECORD, and that they all be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the telegrams were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and the first telegram and the names were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MUSCLE SHOALS PLANT.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry a letter from John Thomas Taylor, vice chairman of the American Legion, in reference to the Muscle Shoals project.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C., January 15, 1923.

Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The national legislative committee of the American Legion desires to lay before you a resolution concerning the Muscle Shoals plants and properties and to urge that Congress adopt a definite policy at this session for the development and operation of this great national project.

This matter was given most careful and serious consideration at the national convention of the American Legion, assembled at New Orleans, La., on Friday, October 20, 1922, and the following resolution adopted:

"Whereas at the beginning of the World War the United States Government was brought to a realization of the fact that it was wholly dependent upon the Chilean nitrate beds and German war-built nitrogen plants for its supply of nitrogen, which is absolutely necessary for the manufacture of high explosives; and

"Whereas the said United States Government did thereupon appropriate large sums of money for the erection and operation of nitrate plants Nos. 1 and 2 at Muscle Shoals for the manufacture of nitrogen in large quantities by extracting same from the air, which said plants were completed and successfully operated just prior to the armistice, or just after, and are the only air-nitrogen plants in the United States of America; and

"Whereas the above-mentioned plants have not only been left inoperative since the war, but have constantly fallen into a state of deterioration, at an expense of many thousands of dollars annually to the taxpayers of this country, while similar air-nitrogen plants in Germany were speedily converted so as to manufacture cheaply nitrogen fertilizers for the enrichment and reclamation of the arid farm lands of Germany, which has proven to be an untold blessing to the people of that country; and

"Whereas we believe that the continuance of our dependence upon foreign countries for the necessary supply of nitrogen for fertilizers in time of peace and for explosives in time of war is not only an unspeakable humiliation but is positively perilous from the point of view of the national defense: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, (1) That we, the American Legion, in national convention assembled, do hereby call upon the Congress of the United States, upon the assembling of same, immediately to take up and act upon the measures pending in Congress, or that may be introduced immediately upon the reconvening of same, on the subject and to determine upon a fixed policy as to the disposition of same; and

"(2) In determining upon the disposition to be made of said properties they may be governed by the following principles which we believe to be fundamental, namely,

"(a) No policy or plan should be accepted which does not provide for the operation of said plants in time of peace and the manufacture of fertilizer, and the test for acceptance of any offer should be the amount of fertilizer proposed to be manufactured;

"(b) No plan or policy should be adopted which is calculated to introduce Federal operation of the project;

"(c) The fertilizer production at Muscle Shoals shall have preferred supply of power in time of peace; and

"(d) No plan or policy should be adopted which does not assure the Government that a research or experimental department will be maintained and conducted in connection with the plants for the purpose of keeping up with the most approved methods of nitrogen production, and that in the event of military emergency the said plants will be made available to the Government, at the call of the Secretary of War, for the manufacture of nitrogen for explosives.

"(3) That the national legislative committee of the American Legion be directed to use all possible legitimate efforts to the end that the Congress of the United States immediately enact such legislation as aforesaid."

From the above-quoted resolution you will note that this great project should be—

First. Under private control and operation (not under Federal or governmental control and operation);

Second. That fertilizer production shall have preferred supply of power in time of peace and nitrogen production for high explosives in time of war; and Third. That suitable legislation providing for the adoption of a permanent policy be immediately enacted by this Congress.

This entire matter has been before both Houses for some time and has been thoroughly considered and reported on by the committees after full and comprehensive hearings have been held.

As the American Legion has in national convention passed this very important resolution entitled "Reclamation and national defense," we are interested in having the matter considered at the earliest possible time, and we write you now to ask you when Congress expects to take the matter up with a view to giving careful consideration to the proposals that have been made and with a view to adopting a definite and comprehensive policy for the development and operation of this great project. In making some investigation in connection with our effort to ascertain the status of this question we have noted that on August 25, 1922, when this matter was under discussion in the House, Floor Leader MONDELL included in his remarks the following:

"I agree with the gentleman from Illinois that this matter ought to be considered and settled by this Congress, and as soon as it can properly be done."

We urge upon you as a Member of this Congress immediate consideration of this legislation, so vital to the national defense of our country should the country become involved in war and so indispensable to our agricultural welfare.

Very truly yours, JOHN THOS. TAYLOR,
Vice Chairman, National Legislative Committee.

THE WAR DEBTS.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, while our Debt Funding Commission continues to proceed without taking the American people into its confidence, I notice that the British Government is giving out information to the British people back home. It is quite remarkable that we have to obtain news as to what this commission is doing from London dispatches. I quote one published yesterday:

LONDON, January 15.—Premier A. Bonar Law instructed Chancellor of the Exchequer Stanley Baldwin, who is now in Washington heading the British Debt Funding Commission, to insist upon a further interest rate reduction. He suggests that the United States would consent to 3 per cent upon the $4,277,000,000 owing to the United States. The premier approves payment of the debt with bonds.

It is quite remarkable, Mr. President, that the only tangible information that has been given as to the settlement of the British debts comes from London. I am glad to know that our British brethren are willing to take their people into their confidence to some extent, at least, and I believe the American commissioners would succeed better if they were to take the American people into their confidence and tell what is going on. Secrecy in the conduct of governmental affairs never has made for success.

I want to call further attention to the fact that in the newspaper accounts of the negotiations between the two debt funding commissions there is almost invariably a long explanation as to Great Britain's large debt, as to Great Britain's large loans to other countries, as to Great Britain's large tax rates, the fact that Great Britain bought American goods with the money, and every conceivable argument which would aid Great Britain in securing an advantage in the parley. The American case is never stated. I am going very briefly to outline the American side of the controversy.

First. America loaned this money at a time when Great Britain needed it most, and she loaned it without stint.

Second. Under the terms of the act of Congress under which she loaned it, she loaned it upon the best and lowest terms upon which any nation during a war ever borrowed money.

Third. Instead of the fact that she bought American goods with the money, or with the most of it, being a reason why she should be dealt with more leniently, it is a fact that ought to be the strongest reason why she should pay under the terms of the act which she borrowed. The goods that she bought in America were infinitely more vital and valuable to her than all the money of the world at that time. She had to have the supplies. These supplies—not the money—saved her government.

Fourth. She borrowed the money under the act of Congress, and she ought to come forward and pay under the terms upon which she borrowed. She knew the act of Congress and its terms before she accepted the money.

Fifth. The American commission seems to be giving great weight to Great Britain's tax rate. They should not lose sight of the American tax rate, which is the highest in its history.

Sixth. Counting cash and bonds, the war cost America practically as much as it cost Great Britain.

Seventh. Great Britain, as the result of the war, received a vast empire in territory and some 40,000,000 additional people, and has the promise of large reparations. The United States received nothing as the result of the war.

Eighth. Since the war Great Britain has found no difficulty in financing purchases of oil in various parts of the world. Her investments in this matter alone amount to hundreds of millions of dollars; and in many of these acquisitions of oil property it is stated on the best of authority that she has excluded America and Americans.

Ninth. She has found no trouble in finding money to lend to foreign countries where it was thought helpful to her trade and commerce. In doing this, of course, she comes directly in competition with American shipping interests.

Tenth. She is maintaining the most expensive navy in the world, and a very large army.

Under these circumstances, which I am sure will be admitted by everyone, it seems to me that our Debt Funding Commission, our American newspapers, and the American people would do well to be considering America's side of the question rather than laying too much stress upon Great Britain's inability to pay us what is right and reasonable.

Mr. President, in submitting these views I again wish to say that I am not submitting them in a spirit of hostility to Great Britain. If Great Britain wants a longer time for these bonds to run than the 25 years, as provided in the original act, I for one have no objection to giving her a longer time; but in so far as the rate of interest is concerned, fixed by the last act of Congress at 4½ per cent, that should be satisfactory to our British friends. It is just about the rate at which we borrowed the money from the American people to lend to Great Britain. The rate fixed should certainly not be less than the rate at which we borrowed. If it should be, then we will be unfair and unjust to the American taxpayers.

In every transaction that we had with Great Britain during the war, she put it upon a business basis. She charged us for everything done for us in the war, and we have paid in full. Now Great Britain should pay what is right—nothing more and nothing less. Her representatives here are no doubt splendid business men, and they are making the best trade they can. There is no sentiment whatever in their handling of the matter. Our representatives should look at it in the same businesslike way; and our newspapers, if they desire to submit the British view, as they so frequently do, should be fair enough to the American people to submit the American view also. Of course, we should be absolutely fair to our British friends, and in the same way we should be fair and just to the American people, who lent them this money at the most critical period of their Nation's history.

Mr. President, in this connection I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD in 8-point type an article by Garet Garrett, which is the same article that was printed in the Saturday Evening Post of November 25, 1922. I think it is one of the most excellent statements of the American position that I have seen; it presents facts that can not be controverted, and I believe it will be intensely interesting to every Senator. I hope every Senator here will just spare about 10 minutes tomorrow to read it, and thus obtain a sensible presentation of the American view. The British propaganda has received such wide publicity in this country, and the real facts have been so carefully concealed, that our public has a false notion about these debts. After giving her 5 per cent obligations for this debt, as she has already done, and which are now in the hands of the American Government, Great Britain should be gratified to accept the rate of interest fixed in the pending act, namely, 4½ per cent. In passing this act America has voluntarily reduced the agreed rate three-fourths of 1 per cent, and surely after this generous treatment Great Britain should not ask more. We hold her 5 per cent obligations now. We are generous in voluntarily reducing the rate. Great Britain has not offered to reduce any obligation which we owed her. She insisted that we pay in full, and we paid in full. During the war she constantly sought to charge us more for goods bought of her than she charged her own citizens. We do not see the American view in our papers, but they constantly print propaganda evidently coming from British sources. Why not consider for a few moments the American view? I urge Senators to read this article, and I also want to commend it to the careful reading of the American Debt Funding Commission. If they could be induced to consider even for a moment the American side of the controversy I am sure they would secure a more acceptable settlement.

I ask unanimous consent to have the article printed in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, in 8-point type.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

NOTES ON THE WAR DEBTS, WITH SOME COMMENT ON THE BALFOUR LETTER.

(By Garet Garrett.)

Things as things and the unremembered circumstances—a time would come to speak of them.

The war cost the United States a little more than $1,500,000 an hour.

After the associate hand of America went in, it lasted 14,000 hours more and cost all of the European Allies combined, out of their own resources, a little less than $2,750,000 an hour.

Besides our own direct contribution of more than $1,500,000 an hour, we loaned to the allied Governments nearly $750,000 an hour, and these loans now constitute the European war debt to this country. Direct advances of Liberty loan dollars from the United States Treasury amounted to $9,500,000,000. Then when hostilities had ceased, France, Great Britain, Italy, Belgium, and others took over from us, on credit, docks, buildings, plants, railroads, machinery, and vast stores of food and other supplies. This wholesale bargain sale of our things on their soil increased the debt to more than $10,000,000,000. Loans for relief and unpaid interest have slowly increased it since, until now it stands between $10,500,000,000 and $11,000,000,000.

Until the war Europe was creditor to the whole world, drawing billions of interest annually from distant countries, including at least $500,000,000 a year from the United States. Now for the first time it owes, and from thinking of this debt of, say, $11,000,000,000 to the United States it has developed a kind of debtor's hysteria. Although it has not paid a dollar of principal and only a very little of the interest, it complains that the debt is crushing it and asks to be forgiven. It owes itself so much on account of the war that it can not pay. Or it can not pay us until Germany pays, and it seems impossible to make Germany pay.

LORD BALFOUR'S NOTE.

Great Britain's position is peculiar. Her own war losses notwithstanding, she is still a great creditor nation, with investments scattered all about the world. Therefore, she is obliged to hold for the sanctity of debts between nations. She can not afford to talk or advocate repudiation. Always, she has said she would and could pay her debt to the United States. Yet, steadily, since the armistice, cancellation of war debts has been powerfully and adroitly urged.

First it was urged on the ground that otherwise the Allies would be obliged to consume Germany; then on the ground that they could not consume Germany if they would; and again on the plea that it would be very good business for us.

For four years Great Britain had been moving ceaselessly by indirection to bring about a general cancellation of inter-ally debts, meanwhile failing to enter into any arrangement that looked to the payment of either principal or interest, and at last Congress called by law for action. Thereupon, Lord Balfour, Acting Secretary for Foreign Affairs, addressed to Great Britain's European allies, all of them America's debtors, a note on the subject of the debts. In this note he said that for the good of mankind and to mitigate the economic evils from which the world is suffering the Government of Great Britain thought of performing an act of unparalleled generosity. That would be to cancel, forgive, utterly wipe out all the war debts owing to it by its allies, and also to forego any share whatever in the German indemnity, to the one colossal aggregate sum of £3,400,000,000. But, alas, it was impossible for the Government of Great Britain to obey this impulse. Why? Because the American Government would not enter into the British Government's spirit of generosity; because the American Government would not forgive about a quarter of this sum, say, £850,000,000, owing to it from the Government of Great Britain. And while, "To generous minds it can never be agreeable, although for reasons of state it may perhaps be necessary, to regard the monetary aspect of this great event as a thing apart, to be torn from its historical setting and treated as no more than ordinary commercial dealing between traders who borrow and capitalists who lend," nevertheless, the British Government, because the Americans insisted on being paid, was distastefully and regretfully constrained to call upon France, Italy, and the others to pay on their war debts to the British Treasury at least enough to enable the British Treasury to pay in full its debt to the United States.

UNCLE SAM CARTOONED ABROAD.

Thus Mr. Balfour in his letter subtly though fairly definitely accused the American people of tearing the war debts apart from their historical setting in order to treat them in the selfish, ungenerous spirit of traders.

In Europe the effect of this upon public opinion was profound. The whole Old World press has since been filled with cartoons representing the United States to be the Shylock of the world. This picture has been endlessly reproduced in words of comment, even in newspapers, reviews, and magazines of high repute, all taking Lord Balfour's distinguished word for an exact statement of the case. The London Economist, a journal of financial opinion far above the drift of mob emotions, the most influential publication of its kind in England—the London Economist of all papers—printed a communication from "Portia," who said that for the United States to demand payment from Great Britain was to lay a tribute upon those who saved Kansas and Kentucky from the German peril, adding, "Even the terrible law courts of the Middle Ages refused to sanction removal of the merchant's flesh when it was pointed out that his lifeblood would follow." Even those of Lord Balfour's critics who said that to have written his letter when and as he did was a political blunder almost invariably have made it worse by adding: "Nevertheless, the truth is there. 'Tis Shylock again, demanding his pound of flesh. We shall have to pay what's in the bond.

Americans were shocked. For several days they went about saying to each other, "Can it be true? Are we like that?"

We do not carry figures in our heads. We had forgotten them. We had forgotten the terms and conditions. In fact, as people, we had been thinking very little about our war loans to Europe. Among a thousand of us taken unawares there would have been, perhaps, not one who could have said how much they were or for what they were made exactly, except to help win the war, and certainly not one who would have had any positive notion as to how they ought to be settled. But to the imputation that our way with them was that of traders we could not be indifferent. We said: "No; we are not like that. In our hearts we know it. Let us look at the record."

The record is of prodigious extent, not at all readable, and few people have ever been seriously interested in it, merely taking right consummations for granted. No one person has yet read the whole of it. Perhaps the British have never read it at all. Or it may be that the truth, like a giraffe in one's back yard, is so astonishingly palpable that one who wishes it were not so may see and disbelieve.

In the first place, when Great Britain says she is willing to forgive war debts of £3,400,000,000—say $17,000,000,000—while the United States is unwilling to forgive only about a quarter of that sum, say, £850,000,000—$4,250,000,000—the arithmetic is misleading.

In that sum of $17,000,000,000 of war debts due to Great Britain, which she would forgive, is included $7,250,000,000 of German indemnity, which now is admitted to be uncollectible.

The American Government has no claim upon German indemnities. It does not participate. Thus the figure of Great Britain's generosity is swelled with a claim against Germany for $7,250,000,000, in contrast with which the American Government has no such claim to be either enforced or forgiven, for the specific reason that it never made one and left the Allies free to take for themselves first whatever they could get from Germany.

THE NET FIGURES OF FORGIVENESS.

If we deduct Great Britain's claim upon Germany, the actual amount of debt she is willing to forgive becomes $9,750,000,000. On the other hand, in the event of an all-around cancellation of war debts, the amount the United States would have to forgive would be $10,500,000,000, for, of course, we could not forgive Great Britain $4,250,000,000 and collect from all our other debtors. We should have to forgive everybody. Moreover, in the event of an all-around cancellation, Great Britain would both forgive and be forgiven, whereas the United States could only forgive. Great Britain would forgive $9,750 000,000 owing to her and at the same time be forgiven $4,250,000 000 owing by her to the United States. The case would then be:

Great Britain forgives	$9, 750, 000, 000
Great Britain is forgiven	4, 250, 000, 000
Net British sacrifice	5, 500, 000, 000
The United States would forgive and sacrifice	10, 500, 000, 000

Thus we, the traders, would lose $5,000,000,000 more than Great Britain.

Now, let us go straight to the heart of the matter. There are only two questions, namely:

1. Should Europe's war debt to the United States Government be paid as a matter of right?

2. Can it be paid as a matter of fact?

The first question has two aspects—a legal aspect and a moral aspect; and since the legal aspect is not final, let us now dispose of it.

Read first the face of one of those bits of I O U paper which the allied Governments left at the United States Treasury to represent the value of the things they borrowed from America during and after the war. It is understood that we speak of things. What we loaned was not money but things, such as food, steel, munitions, and cotton. As the allied Governments bought these things from the American farmers and manufacturers they got dollars from the United States Treasury to pay for them, and for those dollars they gave their I O U's, called certificates of indebtedness, which were temporary, identical for all borrowers, and recited an obligation as follows:

> This certificate will be converted by the Government of the * * * (United Kingdom of Great Britain) * * * if requested by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States of America, at par, with an adjustment of accrued interest into an equal par amount of 5 per cent gold bonds * * * conforming to the acts of Congress.

It was as if a man in desperate haste came to a bank where he was known, saying: "I need some money out of the till—quick! My life is in jeopardy for want of it. I haven't time now to do more than write you an I O U. Later, whenever you say, I'll come in and make it regular by giving you a long-term promissory note."

Well, in that way, on their simple I O U's, the United States Government loaned Great Britain, France, Italy, and the other allied countries billions of dollars, which were the proceeds of our Liberty bonds; and the allied countries spent those billions of dollars for the food, the steel, the munitions, the cotton, and the like they required in order to continue their part in the war, while at the same time we were producing and requiring enormous quantities of the same things in order to do our part. We put $22,000,000,000 worth of things into the war on our own account, besides what we loaned in that way to the Allies.

The war was won, and there came the Peace Conference.

Almost the first concrete matter with which President Wilson was confronted at Paris was a proposal from Great Britain to cancel all interally war debts by an act of fantasy. What Mr. Lloyd-George proposed was that there should issue a great quantity of German bonds to be divided among the Allies and the United States; with those bonds the Allies would pay off their debts to each other and to the United States, and the slate should be clean. Cancellation of the interally debts at that time with German bonds would have come precisely to the same thing as now to cancel those same debts with air and gestures and was open to the same notable objection, namely, that the United States would sacrifice much more than any other country—$5,000,000,000 more than Great Britain—to the happy solution.

That was the formal beginning of an agitation that has continued up to this time. It has been a most consistent agitation, with one end steadily in view—an all-around cancellation of debts.

But before that, on December 4, 1918, less than a month after the armistice, we find in the record a cable message from Oscar T. Crosby, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, to the Secretary of the Treasury in Washington, saying:

> Chancellor (meaning the Chancellor of the British Exchequer) revived suggestion made before of possibility of cancellation of all loans made by one associated government to any other for the conduct of the war.

And on the next day came a message from Norman H. Davis, special United States commissioner of finance in Europe, to the United States Treasury, saying:

> As I have already advised you, the British treasury has notified the French and Italian treasuries that they are through making advances to them. They have either done this in order to force them on us or for political reasons to force their opinions at the Peace Conference. * * * The British treasury attitude regarding relief has changed considerably. In discussing the question of relief to Belgium and Serbia Keynes told me substantially that he had changed from his original idea of dividing the financial assistance into three parts, because in view of the fact that they have advanced considerably more than we have to these countries we should be willing to finance practically all of the relief. I told him we might be willing to finance the relief. * * * But it would not be because they had advanced more or less to these countries than we have; nor should we take the position that the war should be continued for a year or two in order to enable us to loan as much to other governments as the British had loaned them.

CONTINUING CANCELLATION TALK.

And after this, after Great Britain had begun to move for the cancellation of all debts, after December 4, 1918, we advanced $500,000,000 more to Great Britain alone.

At Paris President Wilson was interested in German bonds just as much as the American people were interested in German indemnities or spoils or division or the arithmetic of victory, which was not at all. He said no.

His saying no did not stop the agitation for a cancellation of the debts. It continued at the Peace Conference, in conversations among the allied premiers, in private interviews, and in propaganda to the press. The record is full of it. On March 8, 1919, the American Treasury formally notified the French of its surprise, in view of their still receiving money from the American Treasury, that at a meeting of the financial drafting committee appointed by the executive council of 10 at the Peace Conference, one of the allied governments having proposed as a financial question affecting peace the reapportionment and consolidation of war debts, the proposal was strongly supported by the French representative, M. Klotz. The French replied March 18, 1919, that it was the Italians who had raised that question; all the French did was to ask that it should not be discarded a priori.

After that the American Treasury advanced $750,000,000 more to France and nearly $250,000,000 more to Italy.

Reflecting upon the spectacle of the American Treasury continuing to advance hundreds of millions of dollars, without security, to foreign governments which at the same time are debating a cancellation of those very loans! When did a Shylock lend money in that manner?

More than a year elapsed. Then Mr. Albert Rathbone, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, was sent to Europe to ask our debtors to make their I O U's into regular loans. This you might think would be a purely formal consummation, seeing that all the borrowing governments alike were pledged in writing on the face of the paper to do this thing on request. The record speaks.

On February 2, 1920, there is a memorandum from Norman Davis, then Assistant Secretary of State, to President Wilson, saying:

> As you are aware, efforts beginning with the peace negotiations were made to bring about a cancellation of our debts against the allied governments, but the question was not presented in such a definite way as to require us to take any formal action. Much to the surprise of the Treasury, in connection with negotiations which have been under way with the British treasury regarding the funding of short-time obligations of the allied governments, the question has been formally raised by the British treasury, both in a communication to Mr. Rathbone and also in a message from the Chancellor of the Exchequer sent through the British Embassy, in which, among other questions, the chancellor, in effect, invites the American Treasury to a consideration of a general cancellation of all intergovernmental debts. * * * While the Allies have never bluntly so stated, their policy seems to be to make Germany indemnify them for having started the war and to make us indemnify them for not having entered the war sooner.

To these suggestions from the British Chancellor of the Exchequer the Secretary of the United States Treasury replied as follows:

> As to the general cancellation of intergovernmental war debts suggested by you any proposal or movement of such character would, I am confident, serve no useful purpose. On the contrary, it would, I fear, mislead the people of the debtor countries and arouse hopes the disappointment of which could only have a harmful effect. * * * The United States has shown its desire to assist Europe. Since the armistice this Government has extended to foreign governments financial assistance to the extent of approximately $4,000,000,000. Their need now is for private credits. * * * This Nation has neither sought nor received substantial benefits from the war. On the other hand, the Allies, although having suffered greatly in loss of lives and property, have under the terms of the treaty of peace and otherwise acquired very considerable accessions of territories, populations, economic and other advantages. It would, therefore, seem that if a full account were taken of these and of the whole situation there would be no desire nor reason to call upon the Government of this country for further contributions.

NEGOTIATIONS POSTPONED.

Well, after that there was nothing for it but to abandon the proposed cancellation plan and perform the obligation expressed on the face of the I O U or to refrain from doing so.

In May, 1920, the papers were all ready to be signed, and Mr. Rathbone was on his way from Paris to London to take the British signature, when suddenly he was notified by the British Chancellor of the Exchequer that he need not come. Negotiations were off. It appeared that it had been decided that the general situation must be further explored and Mr. Lloyd-George would write to President Wilson about it.

Mr. Lloyd-George did write to President Wilson about it, but not until the following August. He expressed regret for the delay, saying: "I come now to the other question I wish to write to you about, and that is the knotty problem of interally indebtedness. Indeed, I had promised Mr. Rathbone long ago that I would write to you about it, but I have had to put it off for one reason and another until now."

The British and French Governments, he went on to say, had been trying to fix the German indemnity at a reasonable sum, but the French could accept nothing less than all they had hoped for under the treaty, unless Great Britain would forgive them their debt to the British treasury, and this Great Britain could not consider except as part and parcel of an all-around settlement of interally indebtedness. He added: "I recognize that in the midst of a presidential election it is impossible for the United States to deal with this question in a practical manner; but I should very much welcome any advice which you might feel yourself able to give me."

To this President Wilson replied: "The United States Government fails to perceive the logic in a suggestion in effect either that the United States shall pay part of Germany's reparation obligation or that it shall make a gratuity to the allied governments to induce them to fix such obligation at an amount within Germany's capacity to pay."

A TARDY PROPOSAL.

All that has happened since has been monotonous. The campaign for a general forgiveness of debts has continued without cease and has culminated in the suggestion that the American people are treating the debts in the manner of traders who will have their due, though it ruins Europe.

This brings us to the moral and controlling aspect of the question: Should Europe's indebtedness be paid as a matter of right?

It is bound to be admitted that cancellation may be morally urged upon one ground only—that is, upon the ground that the war was a common enterprise in defense of civilization, wherefore no money account should have been kept at all, and no defender should charge another for things contributed.

Americans understand that view romantically. They might have accepted it, indeed, if it had been presented at the time, or at any time before the war was won and the money account that had been kept of things contributed was as it is.

The amazing fact is that neither Great Britain nor any other allied government in Europe is proposing even now to take that view of the case actually. What is proposed only is that America shall uncharge Europe for the things Europe borrowed in the United States. It has never once been suggested that Europe should uncharge America for the things America bought and paid for in Europe during the war for the war.

While Great Britain, France, Italy, and the other Allies were giving us their I O U's for the war things they got in the United States, we paid at once for all the things we got in Europe. The difference between giving one's I O U for things as others gave us theirs and paying for things as we paid them is the difference between plus and minus. For example, there is an extra pair of shoes in England. General Pershing wants that pair of shoes for his Army and buys it because that will be a little quicker than to get it from home. Now, if he gives England an I O U for that pair of shoes it is just a matter of one pair of shoes some time to be settled for and nothing more. Instead he pays at once with an order on the United States Treasury for so many dollars. Britain spends those dollars in the United States for another pair of shoes and then there are two pairs of shoes for the soldiers in France.

Thus America's expenditures for war things in Europe gave Europe more dollars to spend for war things in the United States and increased the means to victory; and the aggregate of these expenditures was enormous—four or five billion dollars.

If now America's debtors, the allied countries, were proposing really to treat the war as a common cause in the faith of mankind, wherein no one should have been charged for the things consumed, they would be obliged to say: "Uncharge us for the war things we got on credit in the United States and we will uncharge America for the corresponding things it bought and paid for in Europe." Nobody says that. Why not? Why, for a very obvious reason. If you uncharge a nation for things that were bought on credit you simply tear up its I O U's. But if you uncharge a nation for things that have been actually paid for you have to return either the money or the equivalent in things. That is precisely what Europe has not been prepared to do.

There is no thought of uncharging all around. There is no thought of uncharging America. There is only the idea of cancellation all around, which would mean to uncharge the allied countries for what they borrowed in this country, enable them to forgive Germany and leave the United States holding the bag.

So far one discovers no shape to the idea, beautiful and romantic in itself, that to a common purpose all things were in common and not chargeable to one another.

Did this idea ever exist?

During the war we did not encounter it.

Did it exist when we were charged rentals and port taxes and rail mileage for our cars and locomotives and damages for the roads we built in France? It was all right. We paid and were good friends still. But we were charged and we did pay and we hear no suggestion that we should not have been charged or should not have paid or ought now to be uncharged.

Did the idea exist when the British charged us $90,000,000 for transporting 1,000,000 of our troops to France? That was all right, too. We do not owe for the service. We have paid.

THE JUTE AND SILVER EPISODE.

Clearly it did not exist when our War Industries Board was struggling with the British ministry of munitions and could not by persuasion fully open its eyes to see how unfair it was that we should be charged trade prices for the war things we bought in the British Empire while Great Britain on its purchases in the United States received full benefit of war-control prices.

The American Government had created price-fixing agencies, and these agencies not only determined the prices to be paid by the American Government to its own people for the things of war but those same prices applied also to the purchases of allied countries. These allied countries were charged exactly what the American Government paid for food, raw materials, and manufactures.

In the same way the British Government fixed prices for itself in its own country and throughout its empire, but those prices did not apply to American purchases in the British Empire. We were charged more. Our War Industries Board sent a mission to Great Britain to deal with these matters. On page 84 of its report we read:

The mission had an important struggle with the British Government on the question of jute. All the jute of the world comes from India, and the British Government urged that it could not control the price, because it was an affair of the Indian Government. The mission pointed out that our Government was supplying silver to the Indian Government through the mediation of the British treasury, and that if the British Government could not exercise control in India our Government might find it necessary to withdraw from the arrangement of supplying silver, and by thus causing a depreciation of Indian currency buy the jute at reasonable prices.

There is a story by itself—a story of silver and jute and deviltry. German propagandists started a rumor in India that the Indian Government could not on demand redeem those millions of paper rupees which the people of India had been taught to believe were as good as silver, because the silver was always there and they could get it when they wanted it. And the rumor was true! The Indian Government had let its silver hoard run down. The Indian people began to present their paper rupees and demand silver, and the Indian Government was embarrassed. It could get gold, but gold would not go. The people demanded silver, and if they did not get it their faith in Great Britain would be ruined. It was a very serious matter. Revolution might be the least of its consequences.

Jute comes from India and nowhere else, and jute was an essential war material. At that moment the only available supply of silver in the world was a pile of two hundred-odd million silver dollars in the basement of the United States Treasury, sacredly pledged to redeem an equal amount of silver certificates passing from hand to hand as currency in the country. Great Britain appealed to America. What was to be done? A conference was held. Leaders of Congress undertook to pass, and did pass, a law that no one could understand who did not have the secret, authorizing the Treasury to melt those silver dollars and lend them to Great Britain. Thus a calamity was averted.

But while we were melting a portion of those $200,000,000 and lending the silver to Great Britain, who made it into rupees and sent it out to India—it took some time—while we were doing that the War Industries Board came to an impasse with the British Government over the price of jute. We had to buy our jute in the English market because there was nowhere else to buy it, and the price we were charged for it was very much more than the price at which the British Government bought its own military supply of the same material. The War Industries Board insisted that the American Government should be permitted to buy jute at the British Government's military price because the British and all the allied countries were permitted to get anything they wanted in the United States at the American Government's military price.

The British Government was very sorry. But that was a matter for the Indian parliament to deal with, and the Indian parliament was deaf and independent. At last the War Industries Board, backed by the whole United States Government, in substance said:

All right. No more silver dollars to be melted up for rupees. Then we shall see what happens to the price of jute.

At that the British Government discovered in the Indian parliament a very acute and hitherto unsuspected sense of hearing, and within 48 hours the American Government was able to buy jute at a fair price.

So it was, to some extent, with wool, of which the British Government got a tight monopoly at the beginning of the war by taking the whole Australian and New Zealand clip at a low price on a yearly basis; and with tin, which is a natural British monopoly; and with practically everything else we bought in Great Britain or the British Empire.

THE 10 PER CENT SURCHARGE.

It came to an episode with the British in wool. The excuse for charging the United States more than Great Britain paid for the wool was that America had no original risk in the monopoly. That seemed a far point. However, we went on from there, and the American Army contracted with the British for a large quantity at the trade price. It was left to the War Industries Board to arrange transportation and other details. It sent two American ships to Australia for the wool, and they were there waiting when the foreign mission of the War Industries Board in London was suddenly asked to sign a contract to pay, above the purchase price, an additional 10 per cent for overhead and administrative expenses. The War Industries Board refused to be charged that extra 10 per cent. Whereupon it received an ultimatum. Unless it signed the contract the American vessels waiting in an Australian port, within the British Empire, would not be permitted to ship the wool.

The War Industries Board said: "We have got to have the wool. Maybe we will sign that contract to get it. But if we do 10 per cent will be added to everything you buy in the United States." That brought about a change in the British attitude.

After the war the United States sent a liquidating commission to square the books. Among the unexpected claims presented by Great Britain against America were what came to be known as hidden costs, proposed to be charged in addition to the prices already paid. On page 58 of the commission's report we read:

An example of such indirect charges was an item covering bonuses paid by the British Government to manufacturers of silica brick for the purpose of stimulating their production, that the brick might be used in the building of furnaces for the production of steel for the manufacture of shells, some of which were sold to America. The commission pointed out how impracticable it would be for each Government to trace every remote and indirect element of cost which had entered into the production of materials furnished to the other. Attention was called to the fact that, under the principle which Great Britain was seeking to apply here, she might ask America to participate in the subsidy which she had paid on the bread which the workers in her steel mills had eaten.

Other incidents passed unmentioned. Before America got into the war allied vessels were exempt from port taxes in French harbors. After we got in the rule was changed. Our vessels were taxed in French ports.

We paid. We could afford to. We were not thinking of it in those terms at the time. It seems now very lucky that we had a War Industries Board that knew how to play this thorny game of trade, for otherwise our expenditures abroad for war things would have been perhaps $1,000,000,000 more.

The view changes. It is the record still.

What were the things—the things the allied governments bought in the United States with dollars borrowed from the American Treasury on their I O U's? They fall into several classes, to wit:

I. Things like food, cotton, and munitions directly consumed for military purposes.

II. Things, especially food, bought on credit in the United States by the allied governments and resold by them in their own countries for civil consumption.

III. Things such as steel, cotton, and other raw materials bought on credit in the United States by the allied governments and resold by them in their own countries to private manufacturers for the purpose of sustaining trade.

IV. Things of all kinds bought in the United States on private credit before the American people entered the war and afterwards paid for with dollars borrowed from the United States Treasury.

V. Things, both food and industrial commodities, bought on credit in the United States after the armistice for purposes of postwar relief and reconstruction.

That these different classes of things require different symbols is obvious.

GOODS FOR CIVIL ISSUE.

If there had ever been the idea that everybody's war things were in common, or if that idea now existed, so as to include their things as well as ours, and if in the fulfillment of that idea we were happily uncharging one another all around, then, of course, those things of the class first mentioned that were directly consumed in military uses would have to be charged off.

In the same way those things of the class next mentioned—food and other vital supplies taken from us on credit and resold for civil consumption—those also would have to be charged off. Civil welfare was essential to victory.

But when we come to class No. III—to the steel, cotton, and other goods and materials bought on credit in the United States by the allied governments and resold to private manufacturers for the purpose, so far as possible, of sustaining trade as usual—perplexities begin.

The effort to continue business as usual in England during the war was heroic. British Government and British business were almost as one. That was quite right. The survival of British trade was a matter of vital importance. Only that is not the point.

The Government of Great Britain took arbitrary control of essential raw materials as a military measure, and in its wisdom divided them between the uses of trade and the uses of war. Then when the United States came into the war private purchases for British trade ceased in the American market. The British Government did the buying for both military and trade necessities with dollars borrowed from the United States Treasury; and then there were two prices and two uses for the same things in Great Britain. There was one price for a thing resold by the British Government for military issue and a higher price for that same thing when resold for civil issue.

Things bought in the United States with borrowed dollars were resold in Great Britain for both military issue and civil issue. In what proportion we do not know. We could never find out.

We do know as to certain great groups of things, such as food products and cereals, that if the entire British Army had been sustained exclusively from what was bought in the United States less than half the total would be accounted for. The other half, therefore, was resold by the Government for civil issue. That applies only to food.

As to raw materials, such as cotton and steel, we can not guess in what proportions they were divided between military purposes and civil issue. The reason we can not guess is that the British Government lumped the figures and we accepted them. For example, in reporting to the United States Government how it had been spending the borrowed dollars it put in one item, as follows: "Exchange and cotton purchases, $1,682,419,875.31."

What did that mean? More than $1,500,000,000 for cotton and exchange! That item alone is more than the national debt of the United States before the war.

Well, the cotton means cotton, though how much cotton nobody knows; and the rest, maybe $1,000,000,000, represents things bought all over the world with pounds sterling—that is to say, with English money—and the dollars borrowed from the United States Treasury were used in the international exchange market to buy pounds sterling, the point of this being to keep business doing as usual in English money, which had been the paramount money of the world, and then to support the value and prestige of that money with borrowed dollars. Instead of purchasing American cotton at New York with American dollars the British Government bought American cotton at Liverpool with English money and then used dollars to redeem its own money at a fixed price in the international exchange market. But for this sagacity on the part of British finance the pound sterling would have declined in prestige and the dollar instead might have become the paramount money of the world. After the war, when dollars with which to support the pound sterling were no longer forthcoming, the exchange value of English money suffered a great fall.

To what extent the pound sterling, while sustained in value with borrowed dollars, was employed to buy things in other markets which were then resold to British trade we can not tell. We knew all the time, however, that materials bought on credit in the United States were replacing materials consumed in British trade. Our War Industries Board was continually vexed at the procedure of taking steel away from private industry in the United States while British steel makers, our competitors, continued to export steel products from Great Britain for profit.

These things are cited for illustration. What they illustrate is how impossible it is for us now to imagine that the war-time transactions between the United States and the Allies were governed by the sentimental idea of all things in common.

EARLY LOANS REFUNDED.

In the fourth class we spoke of things of all kinds—food, cotton, steel, and munitions—first bought in the United States on private credit before the American people entered the war and then afterwards settled for with dollars borrowed from the American Treasury. That is an interesting item. It appears in the record as "Maturities, $648,246,316.94," of which more than half was for Great Britain and nearly all the rest for France. It is thus explained:

In 1918 certain loans fell due that Great Britain had floated in Wall Street through J. P. Morgan & Co. before we got into the war. These were what are known as secured loans—that is, valuable British securities were pledged thereunder. It was thought better to pay them off than to renew them, because to renew them might hurt British credit and also conflict with the sale of Liberty bonds. The easiest way to pay them off, perhaps the only way, was to do it with dollars borrowed from the United States Treasury. That was all right again. Yet the fact stands out that the proceeds of Liberty bonds to the amount of more than a third of a billion dollars were loaned to pay off debts contracted by Great Britain with private bankers before this country had put itself into the war. And this now is a part of that debt owing by Great Britain to the American Government which we are urged to forgive. The securities pledged under those private loans were not received by the American Government.

In the same way French loans amounting to more than a quarter of a billion dollars, floated in Wall Street through private bankers before this country entered the war, matured while we were at war and were paid off with dollars borrowed by the French Government from the United States Treasury.

So our public loans to the Allies were retroactive. More than that, they continued for nearly two years after the end of the war. The armistice was signed on November 11, 1918.

After the armistice, down to July 1, 1919, the United States Treasury advanced $576,000,000 more to Great Britain.

After the armistice, down to May 11, 1920, the United States Treasury advanced $629,789,000 more to Italy.

After the armistice, down to August 26, 1920, the United States Treasury advanced $176,834,467 more to Belgium.

And after the armistice, down to September 28, 1920, the United States Treasury advanced $1,027,427,800 more to France.

The total of these postarmistice advances to Great Britain, France, Italy, and Belgium amounted to nearly $2,500,000,000. What did they represent? Things, to be sure. But things of what kind and for what purpose?

There is no definite accounting in this post-armistice period. Hundreds of millions of dollars went to settle contracts for war things that were running when hostilities suddenly ceased. The remainder—an undetermined amount—went for food, for relief in many forms, and for materials very urgently needed to make the swing from war to peace.

Directly and indirectly a very large proportion of these advances represented the loan of American things toward reconstruction. France, for example, the largest after-the-war borrower, got enormous quantities of American foodstuffs, and to the extent to which she was supplied with foodstuffs and other peace materials on American credit her own resources were released for works of reconstruction.

All of this is a good deal like the item received from the British: "Exchange and cotton purchases, $1,682,419,875.31." We can not break the figures up. Only the borrowers could do that.

Although the record in this respect is dim and confused, owing to the involved nature of the transactions, still it does reveal these "traders" in a very strange light. Having raised billions from taxation and Liberty bond sales to be advanced to the Allies explicitly for the purpose of the prosecution of the war, as provided by law, they strained the law and continued long after the armistice, long after the signing of the peace treaty to make advances, without security, to Great Britain, France, Italy, Belgium, and even to new and enemy countries, ostensibly for relief, but in effect to aid reconstruction.

THE DEBTS ANALYZED.

The Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate explored the record and reported:

That "millions of dollars of this Liberty loan money were loaned to Great Britain after all hostilities had ceased for the purpose of allowing her to build up her export trade."

That "millions of dollars of this Liberty loan fund were loaned to foreign Governments and by them loaned to various relief and reconstruction organizations."

That "money was loaned to these various Governments so that they could repay it to the United States as interest on loans already made."

That "millions of dollars' worth of products purchased with United States money loaned to foreign Governments were sent directly to Germany with our consent."

That "$48,000,000 of the American people's Liberty loan money were used for the purpose of sending supplies into Austria, which country was then our enemy."

Nowhere in the record is there one fleeting glimpse of an idea existing in Europe during the war that war things were everybody's in common and should not be finally charged for.

Nowhere in all the subsequent talk of cancellation of debts is there any suggestion that the things the American Government bought and paid for in Europe should be so regarded. There is only the idea that the things the allied countries borrowed in America should be treated as things in common.

America's debtors have never offered to make distinctions. They have never said: "There were things of many kinds. First, let us set apart those things (a) which contributed to the relief and reconstruction of Europe after the war, and (b) those things which contributed to the maintenance of trade during the war, and (c) those American things that we bought on credit before the United States got into the war and afterwards paid for with dollars borrowed from the United States Treasury. We propose that a commission shall be appointed to go into our accounts and trace out all those three kinds of things in order that we may put them aside and treat them for repayment. The remainder will be war things as such, consumed directly in the common effort, and so much of our debt as these represent we propose to you for cancellation."

No; they have talked only of a cancellation of the whole debt; they have talked of this as persistently and doggedly as during the war they resisted every suggestion that anything we got from them should be charged against their obligations to the United States, which is further proof that never did they regard their things in common with ours. There came a time, with 2,000,000 Americans in France, when the American demand for francs in France was greater than the French need of dollars in the United States. Instead of taking the opportunity to reduce their debt to the United States the French insisted upon charging us dollars for all the francs we needed and having the dollars they got in exchange and didn't need put aside in the United States Treasury as a special credit to be available after the war.

EUROPE MISINFORMED.

Since the only ground upon which the cancellation of war debts may be urged morally is that all war things were in common and not to be charged for, and since clearly that idea never in fact existed during the war and does not now exist except as to our things, not theirs, the question, Should the war debts be paid as a matter of right? is answered.

Then, shall it be supposed that Europe is willfully perverse and fills itself with rage against America in order to rid her conscience of a debt that can not be collected by force or otherwise than as a moral obligation voluntarily paid?

The record, remember, is not a popular document. It is written in a technical language. If Lord Balfour himself could be so misinformed as to fall deeply into error with the subject, how much more excusable it is for the people of Europe—without access to the facts, with no capacity for analyzing the facts—to get a wrong point of view. And Lord Balfour was misinformed on a vital point. There is no other way of accounting for his statement that:

> Our liabilities were incurred for others, not for ourselves. * * * The United States insisted in substance if not in form that though our allies were to spend the money, it was only on our security that they (the United States) were prepared to lend it.

What his countrymen did propose was that Great Britain should act as a conduit for all American loans to the allied cause. This arrangement the American Government declined to consider. It insisted always upon making its loans direct to the country requiring credit. On this the record is very clear. In a memorandum addressed to B. P. Blackett, Esq., of the British treasury, from Mr. Albert Rathbone, Assistant Secretary of the United States Treasury, November 8, 1919, the whole matter is summarized thus:

> You will recall that the reply of the Secretary of the Treasury to the then chancellor's communication, in which he referred to the British treasury acting as a conduit pipe, was delivered to Lord Reading in the late spring or early summer of 1918. This reply reviewed the situation and definitely refused to make reimbursement to your Government for any of its expenditures for France within the British Empire or for all its like expenditures for neutral purchases. This formal statement of the position of the United States Treasury was in effect a restatement of the position that had been taken during the previous months, as to which the representatives in Washington of the British treasury had been fully informed.

There is the hand of trade again. The advantage to Great Britain of converting billions of dollars into pounds sterling and spending those pounds throughout the British Empire and over all the world on behalf of the Allies is rather obvious. We had at least enough trade sense to see that.

There is yet that bleak other question: Can Europe's debt to the American Government be paid as a matter of fact?

If the answer to "can" is "no," we have only beguiled ourselves with "should." Shylock had done much better long since to write his rue upon those I O U's and post them back to their makers.

But consider what this debt represents—what it represents actually not in money but in things.

It represents a surplus of things produced in 19 months by the labor of 100,000,000 people above their own peace needs and war needs combined and loaned away to other people. That is all it can represent.

What would repayment represent? Merely a return of those things or the equivalent thereof.

Does anyone pretend to say that the 172,000,000 people of Great Britain, France, Italy, Belgium, Rumania, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, and Greece, in 25 years, can not with their labor produce in excess of their own peace needs a surplus of things equivalent to the surplus of things produced in 19 months by 100,000,000 people in excess of their own peace and war needs combined?

It will be—has been—said: "That is all very well; but if we produced the things we could not sell them in the United States. They have raised a tariff wall against us."

The answer to that, if it needs to be answered, is that there is all the world in which to sell things. Besides, here comes Mr. Reginald McKenna, formerly chancellor of the British exchequer, with an argument for the cancellation of war debts that entirely disregards the tariff. In a speech before the American bankers' convention in New York he proposed the riddle that a country can not afford to receive payment of a large debt, and cited the fact that with the payment of the French indemnity to Germany after the Franco-Prussian War Germany suffered a depression of trade while France became more prosperous than ever. At this point the propaganda for cancellation of the debts becomes too complex for human understanding. For if this thesis were true the way for Europe to become fabulously prosperous and lay the United States in commercial ruin is to pay her debts as fast as possible.

However, it is not always absolutely necessary for one country to pay its debt to another in things. It happens that our principal debtor is able to pay out of pocket. In that same speech Mr. McKenna said, "England still owns sufficient foreign securities to cover her debt to the United States two or three times over."

This means that the great bulk of Great Britain's foreign investments, probably $15,000,000,000, survived the war intact. Possibly, too, Mr. McKenna was thinking inaudibly of the fact that since the war, with interest accumulating on their debt to the United States Treasury, the British have made large new investments in Germany, Austria, the Balkans, and Asia Minor in banking, shipping, industry, and oil—oil particularly. During the war the Government of Great Britain bought into the Anglo-Persion Oil Co., that now, engaged in private trade, is blotting out American competition in Egypt. This investment has recently been referred to in Parliament as comparable to the Suez Canal.

It would be a great wrench, of course, for Great Britain to sacrifice a third of her foreign investments in order to pay her debt to the United States; but if she had not been able to borrow American dollars all those foreign investments would perhaps now belong to the late Imperial German Government.

If the allied countries did not owe us, they might be paying the Germans.

And if the allied countries do not pay us, we shall, to all intents and purposes, have paid the German indemnity.

REPRESENTATION OF AMERICAN LEGION ON PEACE CONFERENCES.

Mr. BROOKHART. I desire to present a statement and petition from the American Legion adopted at their national convention with reference to representation upon the international conference, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The following statement with the accompanying digest of manifesto was presented to President Harding at 12.30 p. m. to-day by H. Nelson Jackson, of Burlington, Vt., vice president of the Inter-Allied Veterans' Federation, and R. E. Condon, of New York, member of the national executive committee of the American Legion, and the executive council of the Inter-Allied Veterans' Federation.

The digest of the manifesto summarizes the resolutions on world peace presented by the F. I. D. A. C., and unanimously indorsed by the American Legion at its New Orleans convention, October 19, 1922.

The President is requested, in all future interallied and international conferences on peace—political, economics, or armaments—participated in by this country, to appoint a member of the American Legion, nominated by the national commander, so that those who know most about war may have a voice in the consideration of international efforts toward peace.

Resolutions of a similar nature have been presented to their own Government by the chiefs of other veteran organizations composing the Inter-Allied Veterans' Federation, where they have received favorable recognition.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

MR. PRESIDENT: This committee representing the American delegation to the council of the Inter-Allied Veterans' Federation, wish to avail themselves of this opportunity to express to you the American Legion's and our allied comrades' appreciation for your courtesy and thoughtfulness in receiving the veterans representing more than 15,000,000 participants of the late war of eight allied nations, on the occasion of their recent visit to this country. As you are doubtless aware, Mr. President, the purpose of these distinguished soldiers' visit to this country was in the interest of world peace.

May it please you, sir, if we would read a summary of the manifesto which was signed by these delegates before they return to their homeland.

MANIFESTO.

DIGEST OF THE RESOLUTIONS ON WORLD PEACE PRESENTED BY F. I. D. A. C. AND UNANIMOUSLY INDORSED BY THE AMERICAN LEGION IN NATIONAL CONVENTION ASSEMBLED.

With an earnest desire to promote peace, tranquillity, and good will among nations; secure the institutions of organized society; preserve the sacred principles of liberty and democracy and transmit their blessings to posterity; and establish safeguards to prevent the recurrence of war, we, the undersigned, representing the ex-service men of the signatory countries, agree to submit and endeavor to secure the adoption of our societies represented and through them urge upon our respective governments the following declaration of principles:

1. That all international agreements among governments affecting the entire people shall be open and aboveboard, with full publicity.

2. That treaties make the law between the nations. They must be executed in good faith.

3. To oppose territorial aggrandizement.

4. To vigorously suppress within our own boundaries all persons and propaganda seeking to overthrow by force government existing by will of the people.

5. That the financial policies of the Allied Governments must have as their aim the stability of exchange and the resumption of international commerce, and we recommend the suspension of trade relations with countries maintaining armies organized for aggressive purposes.

6. In view of the distorted political reports tending to unbalance the public mind, we recommend that there shall be established by the F. I. D. A. C. a news-disseminating bureau with representatives in every member country; that this agency shall receive the official sanction of the governments of the respective countries; that it shall collect and issue news designed to offset destructive and inflammatory propaganda, particularly the propaganda put out by the proponents of Bolshevism with the intent to change other forms of government, this without in any way censoring or restricting the freedom of the press.

7. That an international court be established to outlaw war.

8. To proceed as rapidly as conditions permit and when the decrees of such court become operative (except for machinery necessary to maintain them and the minimum police forces) to entirely disarm and disband our land, sea, and air forces and destroy the implements of warfare.

This declaration signed by delegates representing eight allied nations, as follows: Belgium, Czechoslovakia, United States of America, France, Great Britain, Italy, Rumania and Serbia, Crotia-Slovenia, and soldiers' organizations similar to and associating with the American Legion under the consolidation known as F. I. D. A. C. (standing for Federation Interalliee Des Anciens Combattants), with a membership of more than 9,000,000 soldiers.

This, we can assure you, is not merely a grouping of phrases, but the result of a continuous series of conferences covering a period of more than two weeks. There can never be a more striking spectacle than the occasion of those deliberations. One witnessed these men approaching the peace table of our conference with empty sleeves, on wheel chairs, crutches, canes, and, being blind, guided by the hands of their fellow comrades.

1. The Allied Veterans are still the defenders of civilization and free people's rights. After having been faithful soldiers, they now want and strive to be their country's and the world's faithful citizens.

2. The respect of the constitution of their own countries is the basis of the Interallied Veterans' Federation.

3. The veterans are determined that no work in the name of peace shall be neglected. They presented their help to their countries and to the right-thinking world in the time of war and they now present themselves to their countries and to the same world for the furthering of peace. This is a privilege and obligation, but they have in mind also that if another war should occur soon they will be called on to furnish the man power.

4. In the aftermath of the war the allied governments have on several occasions had what at least appeared to be serious differences, and the peoples of the world have been fearful that there was a friction which might result in dangerous consequences. During these periods the allied veterans remained inseparable and sought to understand one another more than ever before. This they did do.

5. The peace that we want will not be a peace consented to at any price, but must be founded on justice toward the victims, individually and collectively.

6. In our associations with the chiefs of our allied veteran organizations we have come to respect and understand their unselfishness and worthiness of principle. We have no suspicions against them, as we know you have none against the eminent men the allied governments sent to represent their nations at interallied and international conferences.

7. We have to place before you to-day, Mr. President, one request in the name of the Interallied Veterans. We most respectfully ask your profound consideration of this subject, because after such we believe you will accept the principle and place it in effect at all the interallied and international conferences on peace—political and economics and on armaments. We ask that at all future conferences there be a true representative of war—a representative of suffering, one who can advise the eminent statesmen and experts on the really vital equation of the horrors of war. We modestly advance this suggestion, Mr. President, that it is needless to point out that there are men in our groups who are preeminently fitted for the peace councils of the world.

8. Our allied comrades have already approached the chiefs of state of their respective nations and received a most favorable consideration of the subject. We ask you in the name of the Interallied Veterans that at any future conferences which have to do with peace of the world that the American Legion, through their national commander, be accorded the opportunity to nominate to you the name of a man who would represent those millions of persons who were afforded the greatest privilege which ever can be bestowed upon citizenship, that of wearing the uniform of their country in the time of war.

H. NELSON JACKSON.
R. E. CONDON.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 407), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, if not incompatible with the public interest, report to the Senate what instructions, if any, have been sent to Roland W. Boyden, representative of the State Department with the Reparation Commission at Paris, respecting the subject matter of the speech delivered by said Boyden at Paris on January 9, instant, dispatched either before or subsequent to the delivery of the same, and to further report to the Senate whether or not the speech of said Boyden represents the views of the Department of State in the premises.

ATTORNEYS EMPLOYED BY SHIPPING BOARD.

Mr. KING. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. I have submitted the resolution to the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and I understand he has no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 408), as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Shipping Board is directed to report to the Senate the names of all attorneys who have at any time been employed by the board or by or for the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation or by or for any other agency for said board, specifying the attorneys who have been appointed or have acted upon the regular legal staff of the board or of said corporation or other agency, and attorneys who have been specially employed by the board or by or for the said corporation or other agency, together with a statement of all salaries, fees, and compensation which have been paid to each of the same, and also whether or not attorneys who have acted upon the permanent staff of the board or of said corporation or other agency have resigned their offices to enter private practice and have thereafter received retainers or fees from the board or said corporation or other agency, and the amount of the retainers or fees paid or promised to be paid such persons.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the information asked for by the resolution is, of course, entirely proper; the Senate and the Senator from Utah are entitled to it; and I am not going to make any objection to the passage of the resolution. I desire to say, however, that every such resolution which we pass calling for information more or less diverts the clerical force of the Shipping Board from the regular work and means that much additional expense in carrying on their work. Some of the resolutions which we have passed will cost a great deal of money. I merely make that suggestion with the hope that Senators when determining the matter as to whether or not they shall present resolutions for consideration and passage will take that into consideration. As I have stated, this information is entirely proper, and both the Senate and the Senator from Utah are entitled to it. I have no objection to the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Before the Senator from Utah takes his seat I desire to ask him a question. I ask the Senator from Utah will the resolution which has just been adopted secure the names of the attorneys with whom either the chairman of the Shipping Board, Mr. Lasker, or Mr. Schlesinger talked in New York, when, as testified by one or the other before the House Committee on Appropriations, they sought to get some attorneys to represent the Emergency Fleet Corporation or the Shipping Board, and called a conference of attorneys in New York, some of whom had cases pending, and asked the heads of those firms of attorneys to recommend some attorney to defend such suits? Will the resolution obtain that information?

Mr. KING. I think this resolution, in connection with another resolution which has been adopted by the Senate, will secure all of the information contemplated in the question which has been propounded to me by my friend from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Utah recalls the testimony to which I have referred which was given before the committee in the other House?

Mr. KING. Yes; I remember it.

Mr. HARRISON. And it seems to me it is quite necessary that that information should be incorporated in any response which may be made to the resolution by the Shipping Board.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator from Mississippi.

TAXATION OF STOCK DIVIDENDS.

Mr. BROOKHART. I present a resolution calling for information from the Secretary of the Treasury with reference to the taxation of stock dividends, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa presents a resolution, which the Secretary will read for the information of the Senate.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 409) as follows:

Whereas the Federal Trade Commission reports 328 corporations have released surpluses by the stock-dividend plan during the calendar year 1922 reaching more than $2,149,151,425; and

Whereas section 220, revenue act approved November 23, 1921, provides:

"That if any corporation, however created or organized, is formed or availed of for the purpose of preventing the imposition of the surtax upon its stockholders or members through the medium of permitting its gains and profits to accumulate instead of being divided or distributed, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of such corporation a tax equal to 25 per cent of the amount thereof, which shall be in addition to the tax imposed by section 230 of this title and shall be computed, collected, and paid upon the same basis and in the same manner and subject to the same provisions of law, including penalties, as that tax": Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby requested to furnish the Senate with the names of companies, amounts, and dates of penalties, if any, imposed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue during said year of 1922, pursuant to the provisions of section 220, Internal Revenue Laws of 1921.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa requests unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. CALDER. I ask that the resolution may go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and, under the rule, the resolution goes over.

Mr. BROOKHART. As the resolution is to go over until to-morrow, I desire to have printed in the RECORD in 8-point type for the information of the Senate a letter from the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission embodying a statement of the stock dividends as reported to him from the commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
OFFICE OF THE CHAIRMAN,
Washington, January 4, 1923.

Hon. SMITH W. BROOKHART,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am inclosing a list of stock dividends declared in 1922, similar to the one that I sent you the other day, but covering the whole year.

Yours truly,

VICTOR MURDOCK, Chairman.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
OFFICE OF THE CHAIRMAN,
Washington, December 21, 1922.

Hon. SMITH W. BROOKHART,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am writing in response to your letter of December 7, in which you request "certain information relative to stock dividends having been declared by various companies during the year 1922."

In response to your inquiry there are inclosed certain tabulations, compiled from public sources, of stock dividends declared from January 1, 1922, to December 17, 1922, showing the name of the company, the per cent of dividend, the amount, and the source from which the data was gathered.

The commission has not heretofore gathered any data along the line of your request, and to answer the inquiry it was necessary to rely upon readily available published sources, as to gather the information accurately and efficiently would involve a large expenditure of time and money. Consequently the commission can not and does not vouch for the accuracy nor the completeness of these data.

Yours truly,

STOCK DIVIDENDS, JANUARY 1 TO DECEMBER 17, 1922.

The sources consulted are noted below, and are followed by a code notation, which is used in the list of stock dividends declared to identify the source of information:

Poor's Cumulative Daily Digest of Corporation News, Poor.
Commercial and Financial Chronical, Chron.
Journal of Commerce, New York, J. of C.
Wall Street Journal, Wall.
New York Times, N. Y. T.
Washington Post, Wn. Post.
Christian Science Monitor, Ch. Sci. Mon.

If nothing is suffixed to the amount of the dividend, indicated in column 3, that amount was derived by computation from apparently full data. The suffix "e" means "estimated from incomplete data." The suffix "s" mean that the amount was stated in the source from which the whole item is taken.

The few instances of omission of per cent of dividend and amount may be explained by the fact that the public sources consulted did not give this information, merely stating that a stock dividend had been declared.

Nineteen companies list no dividends.

Stock dividends January 1 to December 31, 1922.

OPERATION OF TRAMP VESSELS BY THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 410), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the United States Shipping Board be, and it is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate at the earliest practicable date full information: First, as to whether or not tramp-vessel operations are being conducted and maintained with Government-owned vessels of the United States; if such operations are being maintained, the number of vessels so engaged, where operated, the character and amount of commodities transported, and the amount of tramp tonnage operated by foreigners to and from ports of the United States, and the amount of cargo so carried in foreign tramp ships in so far as such information is readily available, such information to extend back over a period of one year preceding the date of the adoption of this resolution.

Second, if tramp operations are not being conducted and maintained with Government-owned vessels of the United States, a full statement of the reasons why the said board is not so conducting such operations and maintaining such services.

Third, whether or not, in the opinion of the board, it has full and adequate authority under existing law to provide for the operation and maintenance of tramp services with Government-owned vessels of the United States.

VIEWS OF SENATOR JOHNSON ON EUROPEAN SITUATION.

Mr. MOSES (Mr. LADD in the chair). I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD in 8-point type an article appearing in the New York Times of Sunday by the senior Senator from California, Mr. JOHNSON.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Sunday, January 14, 1923.]

WHY "IRRECONCILABLES" KEEP OUT OF EUROPE, TOLD BY HIRAM JOHNSON—NEED NEW SPIRIT THERE—SENDING OVER OUR MONEY WOULD NOT AID PEACE, BUT BRING WAR.

(By HIRAM JOHNSON, United States Senator from California.)

Just a century ago the new Republic of the Western Hemisphere enunciated a definite foreign policy which has withstood the vicissitudes of time and has become the historic bulwark of the Americas. When the Monroe doctrine was enunciated in 1823 it was substantially the answer to the persuasive appeals made to the United States to become a part of the European system. The Czar Alexander, strange mixture of mysticism, altruism, egotism, intrigue, duplicity, and deceit, had presented to a wondering world his Holy Alliance under which all governments in the administration of their respective States and in their political relations with other governments should be guided by the precepts of religion. Because he desired to extend the membership of the league, and because, too, he wished a counterpoise for Great Britain, Alexander by every persuasive art endeavored to entice the new Republic to his view. In a recent brochure on the Holy Alliance, Doctor Cresson remarks:

"During the great crisis of reconstruction following the Napoleonic wars, Emerson in voicing the liberal opinion of New England but repeated the warnings of Washington. Yet many reasons insistently urged a 'moral participation' in European affairs. Moreover, the invitation extended to the United States to share in the councils of Europe, as we shall have cause to note in the present chapter, was no less insistent than at the present day.

"The decision which the statesmen of the Washington Cabinet were called upon to take with respect to American participation in the affairs of Europe during the period from 1815 to 1818 recalls the no less momentous problems of the present time."

The Massachusetts Peace Society wrote the Czar enthusiastically. The New York Post of that day remarked concerning one of Alexander's conferences—and Doctor Cresson states "conference" was a form of negotiation which Alexander seems generally to have found irresistible and never missed an opportunity of holding—"if discussions run upon the means of consolidating the peace of the world * * * and removing the burden of taxes and unwieldy military establishments which press at this moment upon every country, the members of the Holy League will establish an imperishable claim on the gratitude of mankind."

The Czar, in his secret instructions to his representatives as the means of seducing the young Republic from its national policy, told them to take the steps necessary to persuade public opinion in the United States, and to tell the people of the United States that "they were themselves a European people, Christians, and, therefore, like Europe, interested in questions of a general nature." How familiar it all sounds!

SHADOW OF THE CZAR.

Those were anxious days for Adams and Monroe and their companions at Washington. They plainly foresaw what Castlereagh and Canning, of Great Britain, learned by intimate touch with the Holy Alliance. The Czar's grandiloquent scheme finally degenerated into the doctrine of monarchial legitimacy and threatened interference with liberalism upon the American Continent. Castlereagh announced that Great Britain would intervene in the affairs of others only with "good offices," a policy subsequently characterized by Canning as "resuming her isolation."

"The ground I wish to take," wrote Adams in his diary, "is that of earnest remonstrance against the interference of the European powers by force in South America—but to disclaim all interference on our part with Europe."

"As the Holy Alliance has come to edify and instruct us with their principles," he continued, "it is due in candor to them and in justice to ourselves to return the compliment." Perhaps we may be pardoned if we follow Adams's advice.

As the crisis became acute and Britain's policy became known, Monroe issued his now justly celebrated pronunciamento, which, in reality, ended the pretensions of the Holy Alliance and presented in concrete form a definite American foreign policy forbidding the powers of Europe to extend their system to the American Continent or to control the destinies of its inhabitants, warning against any future attempts at colonization and conceding the corresponding obligation (obligation to the peoples concerned and to our own) not to interfere in the internal concerns of Europe. The policy indeed has been a cardinal one in America's life.

After a hundred years of successful operation, under which the infant Republic has become the greatest, richest, and most powerful country on earth, America is asked again, upon the doubtful plea of moral responsibility, to become a part of the European system. Those of us who have been called "irreconcilables" are resisting with such vigor and ability as we have the insidious attempt and are fighting with such force as we can muster to maintain our country in the path we know which has brought us to our present eminence and success.

The same arts of persuasion, the same sinister influences so valiantly resisted by our statesmen a hundred years ago, intensified a thousandfold by the complexities of our modern civilization, are now utilized again to compel us to enter upon the course we have always shunned. Propaganda, in our day practically an exact science, has been employed to the fullest extent. Civic and religious organizations, like the Massachusetts Peace Society of 100 years ago, have been wrought to a pitch of hysteria by appeals to their aspirations for general peace and the betterment of mankind. And the wickedest part of the present struggle is that the loftiest human attributes of good men and women are unconsciously distorted by cunning intrigue and persuasive, iniquitous propaganda for their country's undoing.

THE "INTELLECTUAL" STAND.

There is another class, too, contributing its share to our present hysteria. There are certain individuals who hug to themselves the title "intellectuals," who contemptuously scorn all petty virtues and who scoff at patriotism. In their superior wisdom and their all-embracing world desires they forget their country and would even leave us naked and defenseless. These "intellectuals" revel in the title of internationalists; and nationalism and patriotism are with them mere terms of reproach.

Great Britain a century ago, when her safety no longer was at stake, retired, as her statesmen termed it, into her "splendid isolation."

Great Britain to-day, if we read carefully the various conferences of the premiers, is again retiring into her splendid isolation, and until Great Britain is directly concerned and her material interests demand it, I venture to predict her policy in the future will be that which she adopted during the reconstruction period of the Napoleonic wars.

Three years ago the aspiration for our participation, as it was termed, in world affairs, performance of our moral obligation to all mankind, assumed the definite demand that we ratify the treaty of Versailles and enter the League of Nations. After literally months of acrimonious discussions and perfervid appeals we declined the invitation and, as some of us thought, reaffirmed the definite policy which had withstood the test of time and had been ours since we became a Nation. Time has demonstrated the wisdom of the Senate in failing to ratify the treaty of Versailles. How few are its advocates now!

The inexorable facts of the last three years have proved, too, the unwisdom of entering the league. Very recent events have demonstrated its futility. One of the treaties written contemporaneously with the treaty of Versailles has been rewritten in the blood of Christians in the Near East. Another has been revised in the tears of a starving people. The League of Nations, a living entity, has stood idly by while its two most powerful members fomented a war between peoples in the Near East, a war which, only when it threatened a general conflagration, caused the intervention of those who had contributed to it. But while peoples there were slaying one another, while one side acted with the aid of one member of the league and its opponent was urged to the slaughter by another, supine and indifferent the league itself sat, although the world knew and all the world now knows the culpability of the league's two most powerful members.

The hysterical demand that all wars would cease by our entrance into the league has changed to another hysterical plea. The appeals in the two instances are in the same generic phrases. Pictured to us now are the suffering of Europe, and starving peoples, and as the troubles and desolation harrow our feelings and arouse every sympathetic impulse the demand is made again that we enter the European system; and the same old phrases, "play our part in the world," "perform our obligation to humanity," "rescue civilization," and the like, are hurled at us from the press and the pulpit, from civic and religious bodies, and by good men and women wrought to a high frenzy by reiteration of the world's woe and anguish, hunger, desolation, and suffering. None can be indifferent to these appeals nor to the prevailing conditions, none so callous or so hardened that he would not willingly aid.

WHAT COULD WE DO?

The new appeal, however, for us to aid the world and save civilization, unfortunately, unlike the former, with its definite demand for entrance into the league, is wholly nebulous. How we "play our part," "perform our world obligations," "succor suffering humanity," and "save civilization" rests in mere aspiration. That we ought to do all these things is clear to our opponents; that they can not be accomplished they dimly see. But nevertheless they have heard so much of world concert and so detest "isolation" and "isolationists" that they would have us forego our old policies and, without counting the cost or reckoning the future, make our country a part of Europe.

What are we to do either in conference or upon the Reparation Commission? To advise, to extend our good offices? That, presumably, we are doing now, and that we can do without either conference or commission. The advocates of the "conference" would have us reach understandings and agreements for the solution of the world's economic ills. The advocates of membership upon the Reparation Commission doubtless see the same end. And perhaps the two suggested plans are not far different, because the crux of the economic situation in central Europe is the question of reparations, with its collateral problems. If we call a conference to reach understandings and agreements, of necessity we must be a part of that conference. If a part of it, we must see it through. If agreements are reached, we must do our part in their execution.

It would be contemptible to call a world conference and then stand aside and say to our guests, "Now settle your own problems; we'll have nothing to do with them." And when we agree upon the solution in good faith we must carry it out. What must be considered? Reparations, and not the amount but the method of collection and enforcement. Collection and enforcement require supervision—supergovernment.

Already there is just that in the Reparation Commission. Supergovernment requires power—power to enforce its decrees. The power now exists in the Reparation Commission. Shall the United States become a party to an agreement to furnish money and men for the enforcement of reparations? Baldly put, this is where either of the proposed plans leads us. At once, if we undertake to carry out the decrees of a conference or become officially a part of the Reparation Commission, we are inextricably entangled in European controversies. We are the one going, solvent, national concern. Place us in a position where we may be used and the possibilities are obvious. It is true we might brave the perils; perhaps the obvious menace we could escape; but by endangering ourselves we endanger our ability to be of service. We do no more by tying ourselves to Europe's difficulties than deprive ourselves of the disinterested position which is our principal asset of world helpfulness to-day.

WOULD NOT HELP FARMERS.

Very cunningly in the present propaganda the plight of our farmers is invoked. If we can but have a "conference," if only we enter the Reparation Commission, if we will but throw in our lot with the rest of the world, the prices of agricultural products will soar and the distress of our farmers be alleviated. Never was there a more unwarranted or a meaner appeal. The internationalists pay our farmers a poor compliment when they imagine that by dangling the bait of higher prices farmers will forget their country's future. But the appeal to cupidity is wholly illusory. The present state of Europe is attributable in great part to the waste of war, which can only be made good by years of toil and frugal living; it is attributable in part to the ruin of Russia; it is attributable in part to the Balkanization of Europe; it is attributable in part to the ambitions and aborted policies of short-lived cabinets. No conference, no league, can re-create in one or many years the destruction which war has wrought. The tables of our exports demonstrate the falsity of the propaganda now so general among our farmers. Taking us into Europe will not aid our farmers. International bankers will reap the benefit and the farmers will pay the price.

There are just three forms of "assistance" which the United States can give in Europe. One is advice. One is force. One is money.

There are just two methods by which any one of these forms of "assistance" can be delivered. One is through action by the United States alone. The other is through action by the United States in a group or groups of European powers. For a century—and as firmly under Woodrow Wilson as under James Monroe—we have repudiated and rejected "assistance" from Europe. The friends of American intervention in Europe are after all seeking a "world organization" only in name. What they in fact are seeking is a European organization of which the United States shall be a member—a European rescue party in which the United States shall do the rescuing, a European settlement of which the United States shall be the guarantor.

Europe thus would be nothing in the Americas and the United States would be everything in Europe. If I were a European I would reject that prospect as vigorously as I now reject it as an American. The situation makes Europe, the motherland of America, the ward of her daughter.

Friendly advice and good offices, if desired, could always cheerfully be given. Advice certainly may not harm him who gives or him who takes. If we feel that we have wisdom which Europe needs, there is no impediment now to the dispatch of any desired quantity of it from Washington to any European capital. No league is needed, no international economic conference is required, no new cables need to be laid, in order to convey the helpful thoughts of our State Department to the European shore. If in America we have produced ideas not known in Europe, if here we have developed a mentality beyond that of Lord Balfour and the other statesmen of Europe, we are in full liberty now to communicate that fact and the fruits of it to an amazed and delighted European population.

The truth is that we have no ideas which are not equally current in Europe. A reading of the European press, a consideration of the speeches of European statesmen, must prove to every fair and calm mind that in the mental armory of America there is no weapon, there is no expedient, not equally known to the leaders of European politics. What Europe lacks is not good ideas. It has all of them that there are. What it lacks is the will to put them into operation.

How shall that will be supplied? It seems to be contended that it could be supplied by American force or by American money.

Every proposal for American intervention in Europe means—if it means anything at all except hypocrisy and deception—participation by America in European agreements; and the only forms of action for making those agreements effective are the forms represented by either force or money.

"MORAL MIGHT" DEFINED.

It is said that American force would never be in practice "needed." It is said that the "moral might" of America would hold European disturbers in awe without any use, actual or potential, of American force. Just what is it that produces this "moral might" of America?

The harsh fact—which our sentimental internationalists refuse to face—is that the overpowering "moral might" of America is only a polite phrase for the overpowering physical might possessed by the United States and available to the United States Government in the enforcement of its governmental will, whether in the Western Hemisphere or on the Rhine.

The situation, then, in one aspect which Europe presents to us, according to those who would have us enter into political agreements with European governments, is as follows:

Europe is unable by its own force to maintain peace within its own borders and it summons the force—the actual force or the potential force; the force exercised or the force threatened—of America.

It is shocking; it is an appalling conclusion. It means the abdication of Europe and its physical guardianship by America. I am unable to believe that Europe actually wants that guardianship; and even if I were finally persuaded that it did actually want it, I would, not only for America but for the sake of Europe itself, persist in believing that it should not be granted.

Europe for its own sake must establish its own modes of European peace. It must develop—even as we developed in 1789—a policy capable of maintaining friendship between jealous separate sovereign States. We made our Constitution not under the tutelage of European policemen but by exertions which, since they were our own, gave us a future stanchly and securely corresponding to our needs. Europe must accomplish a similar achievement in a spirit of similar self-reliance if European civilization is to continue to be European and if it is to be able accordingly to produce in Europe a genuinely sound and healthy European future.

I imagine, however, that while a few misguided Europeans and a few Americans may wish to fill Europe with American soldiers or with the coercive shadow of them, the great majority of Europeans and Americans who speak of American intervention desire not the help of our soldiers but the help of our dollars.

Indeed, I have no doubt of it, and in this I am confirmed by contemporaneous publications abroad. The Manchester Guardian recently said: "But until America is prepared to release Europe from a great part of her debts American 'intervention' must be confined to good advice. Advice, unfortunately, will not stabilize the mark or fill a hole in the French budget." Here's the definite mode of aiding Europe: Cancel the debt due or give money. I challenge those in official position who prate of "intervening" in Europe, economically or otherwise, to advocate cancellation of the foreign debt. They dare not do it. I challenge them to advocate additional governmental loans to Europe. Cancellation of the debt or giving more money are the only methods Europe suggests of economic aid. Is the American exponent of European interference really intending this, while cloaking his lachrymose utterances in general precatory phrases? If so, it's hypocrisy we have to combat, pretense and insincerity, for our people will not cancel the debt nor make additional advances.

I insist that whatever financial help is needed by Europe can be secured from our bankers without any "assistance" from our Government—at any moment when Europe will so rearrange its own political affairs as to make an investment in Europe a safe investment. Our Government has made its last loan for many a day to Europe. It will neither loan more public money nor underwrite the loan of private money.

WHAT MONEY WOULD DO.

One leading banker has already laid down to Europe the terms on which he would be willing to regard an investment in Europe as a safe investment. I speak now of investments on a large scale. Investments on a smaller scale—yet on a scale really, after all, most impressive—have been going forward by Americans in Europe continuously since the armistice.

Seven or eight billions of American dollars—probably ten billions—have gone to Europe in one sort of investment or another since armistice day. Has this investment produced European peace? Would a doubling or trebling of it produce European peace? The realities of the European situation answer an emphatic negative.

If a European Government becomes richer this year than it was last year, does it thereupon reduce its army and contract its diplomatic adventures? Does it cease with new revenue to hate its rivals and to prepare to resist them and to ruin them? If Poland were solvent instead of bankrupt, would she cede to Russia the Russian territory which she now occupies? If Britain received from us a total cancellation of her debt to us, would she retire from her perilous situation with the Turks among the oil wells of Mosul? If France had all the money in the world, would she cease her armaments or love the Germans or ask them to unfurl the German flag once more over the German soil on the left bank of the Rhine?

These questions reveal the preposterousness of the idea that American money can produce European peace. American money poured into Europe—as Europe is to-day—would not retard the next European war. It would accelerate its advent. It would give Europe only the possibility of more soldiers, more cannon, more aggressions, more resistance, and a more rapid and assured arrival of the inevitable cataclysm.

What Europe needs is not rescue but regeneration; and regeneration can not be imposed by force or bought with money. It must proceed from within. In Europe it must be brought about by European self-examination, European contrition, European amendment. American intervention only delays that process. The isolation of America is not Europe's ruin. It is a necessity to Europe's salvation. I do not feel the need of apologizing to Europe for America's isolation. I think that Europe one day will thank America for it. By refraining from mingling itself in Europe's internal affairs, America will have hastened the reemergence into this world of a Europe soundly organized within itself and destined accordingly to be Europe and not an annex to America.

I therefore shall support—to the very end—the totally "irreconcilable" policy of refusing all American governmental force and all American governmental money and all American participation in conferences and agreements leading to the use—outright or implicit—of American governmental force or money for Europe. I maintain—and shall maintain—that this policy is both the wise and safe course for America and the shortest route to the great end which every American desires—the restoration, the revival, the renewed grandeur of the culture of the Continent from which we have our being.

THE "IRRECONCILABLE" POSITION.

The attitude of the "irreconcilable" is dictated, however, primarily by his love of America, his jealousy of the cherished institutions of the Republic, and his firm resolve that they shall endure. It is in some circles deemed trite now to refer to Washington—quotations from him excite there a derisive smile, but with a prescience peculiarly his, Washington foresaw and understood that the young Nation he nourished could only rise to greatness and reach permanency through a distinctive American character. As one eminent biographer has said, in his whole foreign policy, "the American spirit was his polestar." His aim, and that aim until recently every great American has emulated, was to be American and "make the people and the Government American."

We have seen the struggling little Republic of Washington, because of its American character, grow and grow until it is to-day the giant among the nations of the earth. We won respect abroad and happiness at home, and we won our success and renown because we maintained America free from political connections with other countries. Washington's policy and its corollary, the Monroe doctrine, made the United States neither hermit nor meddler. They insulated us against the intrigues of the political life of the Old World; and thus insulated, thus independent, America's participation in the life of the world can be larger and better, because united in its support will be all Americans enjoying in common "an American character."

Plain is our road, and known. If we but keep it, the future of our country is not uncertain. The true "irreconcilable" has dedicated himself to an America "independent of all and under the influence of none"; fulfilling all engagements which duty requires; maintaining a strict neutrality unless obliged by imperious circumstances to depart from it; doing justice to all nations, and from all nations demanding justice; cultivating friendly relations with every nation, and tolerating entangling alliances with none—in short, keeping the Republic free and unfettered, just American.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13481) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. MCNARY. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. MCNARY, Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. LENROOT, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. SMITH conferees on the part of the Senate.

Dak., which was to amend the title so as to read: "An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Sioux City, Iowa, and to Union County, in the State of South Dakota, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Big Sioux River at a point about 2½ miles north of the mouth of said river, between section 14, township 89, range 48, Woodbury County, Iowa, and section 15, township 89, range 48, Union County, S. Dak."

Mr. NORBECK. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE RED RIVER OF THE NORTH.

Dak., which were, on page 1, line 6, to strike out "one"; and to amend the title so as to read: "An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of North Dakota and the State of Minnesota, the county of Pembina, N. Dak., and the county of Kittson, Minn., or any of them, to construct a bridge across the Red River of the North at or near the city of Pembina, N. Dak."

Mr. KELLOGG. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

RURAL MARKETING AND CREDIT FACILITIES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4280.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4280) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States; to amend the Federal reserve act; to amend the Federal farm loan act; to extend and stabilize the market for United States bonds and other securities; to provide fiscal agents for the United States; and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed on page 15, line 10, as follows:

No permit to begin business in any State of the United States shall be granted to any corporation organized under the provisions of this act unless the Comptroller of the Currency shall determine that the laws of such State afford adequate protection to advances made upon the security of warehouse receipts covering agricultural commodities or chattel mortgages upon live stock with respect to (a) bonding, licensing, and inspection of warehouses; (b) recordation of chattel mortgages or deeds of trust on live stock; (c) recordation of brands or other identifying marks on live stock; (d) reporting and recording of interstate shipments and slaughter of live stock; and (e) right of mortgagee to release a portion of the mortgaged property without prejudice to the priority of lien as against junior lienors or other creditors of the mortgagor.

SUPERVISION BY THE COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY.

SEC. 10. That all corporations organized under the provisions of this act shall be under the supervision of the Comptroller of the Currency, who shall be charged with the execution of all laws of the United States relating to the organization, regulation, and control of such corporations. The comptroller shall exercise the same general power of supervision over the operations of corporations organized under the provisions of this act as he now exercises over national banks under the laws of the United States.

In addition to the two Deputy Comptrollers of the Currency now provided for by law, there shall be in the Bureau of the Comptroller of the Currency a third Deputy Comptroller of the Currency, who shall be appointed in the same manner and shall take a like oath of office and give a like bond as the deputy comptroller now provided for by law. Under the direction of the Comptroller of the Currency such additional deputy comptroller shall have charge of the administration of the provisions of this act and shall perform such other duties as shall be assigned to him by the Comptroller of the Currency. The Comptroller of the Currency is hereby authorized to employ such additional examiners, clerks, and other employees as he shall deem necessary to carry out the provisions of this act and to assign to duty in the office of his bureau in Washington such examiners and assistant examiners as he shall deem necessary to assist in the performance of the work of that bureau. The salaries of the Deputy Comptrollers of the Currency and of such additional examiners, assistant examiners, clerks, and other employees shall be fixed in advance by the Comptroller of the Currency. The salaries of the two deputy comptrollers now provided for by law and of all national-bank examiners and assistant examiners assigned to duty in the office of the bureau in Washington in connection with the supervision of national banks shall be considered part of the expenses of the examinations provided for by section 5240 of the Revised Statutes, as amended; and the salaries of such additional deputy comptroller and of all examiners, assistant examiners, clerks, and other employees appointed under the terms of this act and assigned to duty in connection with the administration of this act shall be considered part of the expenses of the administration of this act: Provided, however, That the salary of the additional deputy comptroller provided for by this act shall be considered partly an expense of the examinations provided for by section 5240 of the Revised Statutes and partly an expense of the administration of this act in proportions to be determined from time to time by the Comptroller of the Currency with a view to a fair apportionment of such expense, until such time as it shall be necessary for such additional deputy comptroller to give his full time to the administration of this act. The Comptroller of the Currency shall have power to levy semi-annually upon the corporations operating under the provisions of this act, in proportion to their total assets, an assessment sufficient to pay the expenses of the administration of this act for the ensuing half year, together with any deficit carried forward from the preceding half year. Each such corporation shall pay the amount so assessed against it to the Treasurer of the United States subject to the order of the Comptroller of the Currency, to be disbursed by the comptroller in payment of expenses incurred in the administration of this act.

The comptroller shall have power to appoint and fix the compensation of examiners to examine corporations organized under the provisions of this act or to use national-bank examiners for this purpose. All examiners appointed by him shall be subject to existing provisions of law relating to national-bank examiners and to the provisions of the Federal reserve act which prohibit national-bank examiners from performing any service for compensation for any bank or officer and from disclosing the names of borrowers or the collateral for loans without obtaining the written consent of the comptroller, and such provisions shall be held to apply to examiners appointed to examine corporations organized under the provisions of this act.

Mr. SIMMONS addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered; and the Senator from North Carolina will proceed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to submit for the consideration of the Senate some observations upon the pending bill, commonly known as the Capper bill. I do not wish what I shall say to be understood as importing opposition to its enactment, but as in the nature of criticism of it upon the ground of its insufficiency and inadequacy to accomplish the professed purpose of its sponsors.

I do not say that the proposed bill is bad legislation or that it will be hurtful legislation. I do not see any special harm to come from the enactment of it. Legislation of this character ordinarily might be treated with more or less indifference, but for the fact that the ineffectiveness of legislation intended to meet an emergency calling for prompt and effective action frequently operates as an embarrassment and hinders the adoption of necessary legislation. For this reason, while I see no special harm in the pending bill, I am very much afraid its enactment will be made the excuse for the postponement of proper and adequate legislation.

I regard the Capper bill as of very little consequence so far as it is designed in any way to help agriculture, to help the so-called "dirt" farmer, the man who makes his living by the cultivation of the soil. My reasons for this opinion are two-fold—first, because I do not believe that in the agricultural sections, as distinguished from the stock-raising sections, the machinery provided in this bill will be put into operation, because its provisions will be found impracticable of successful application to the conditions.

I do not doubt that the provisions of the bill relating to stock raising will be both practical and helpful in the great stock-raising sections of the country. I can readily conceive that in that portion of our country where the chief industry is stock raising upon a large scale there may be inducements sufficient to interest capital to invest in the establishment of the loaning corporations provided in this bill, notwithstanding their limited field of operation. My second reason for the belief that this bill will not be of help to agricultural interests is because the restrictions imposed upon advancements for this purpose make it valueless to the farmer.

With these general observations, I want to address myself to the provisions of this bill; and let it be understood now that I am not speaking of the Lenroot bill, and let it also be understood that I am not speaking of the provisions in the bill which propose to amend the Federal reserve act and the farm loan act. Provisions for the amendment of those two Federal agencies are contained both in the Capper bill and in the Lenroot bill. I think the amendments so proposed are very valuable and will be helpful to the farmer and the stock raiser. I am now addressing myself exclusively to the new system of agricultural credits which the Capper bill undertakes to create and put into operation.

The bill provides a system of primary credit corporations, corporations created for the purpose of lending money to farmers and stock raisers, corporations the capital of which is to be altogether furnished by individual subscription. These banks are each to have a paid-in capital of $250,000 before they are permitted to commence business. The bill also creates a system of rediscount credit corporations, each with a paid-in capital of not less than a million dollars, which capital must also be raised by private or corporate subscription.

These banks—and they are in a sense banks, though called in the bill corporations—whether primary banks or rediscount banks, are to be owned and operated entirely by private capital. The Government is not to invest a penny under the plan. The only thing the Government has to do with it is to maintain, through the Comptroller of the Currency and the board put in charge of the system, a general supervision and control over the operations of the institutions of the system, largely for the purpose of stabilization and safeguarding these institutions against mismanagement. My chief objection, as indicated, to the measure is the ineffective and misleading manner with which it deals with agriculture. First, so far as the farmer is concerned, as I have already said, the scheme is wholly impracticable and will not become operative in the agricultural States, and for two good and sufficient reasons.

First, it will be exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, to raise the capital with which to start the business and establish the banks. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars is a large sum of money, especially when it must be raised in large part, if raised at all, by an industry which admittedly is not prosperous at this time, which is a borrower of money, and therefore without ability to furnish the cash capital required in the establishment of these institutions.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have not studied the bill carefully, but I am curious to know whether under it the stockholders and incorporators would be confined to farmers.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; they would not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Anyone could organize these corporations?

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall get to that within a few minutes. I said that if a farmer were able and had the money he no doubt would be tempted to invest it, because if established the system would furnish a source of credit which in some way might be helpful to him, and if he had the money he would have an interest in investing it in this way. But outside capital does not have that personal interest in the creation of such banks. Outside capital would only invest in it, therefore, when there appeared a profit-earning possibility.

The system is defective not only from the standpoint of the inability of the farmer, who is immediately concerned, to furnish the money, but it is defective in that it does not offer a sufficient profit inducement to tempt outside capital that might otherwise invest. Let me develop that. Why do I say that? I say that for the reason that according to the very terms and conditions of the bill these banks, located in agricultural districts, as distinguished from stock-growing districts, are so circumscribed and so limited as to the character of business they may do as to afford no adequate inducement to outside capital.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In order that the Senator may answer what I have in mind——

Mr. SIMMONS. Will not the Senator just let me finish developing that, and then I will be very glad to have him interrupt? I want the Senator to let me state the facts upon which I base that conclusion. I base it upon facts disclosed in the bill, and I want to state them, because I think probably they have not been called to the attention of the Senator or the Senate. Then I shall be more than delighted to have him interrupt me.

Let me call attention, in support of my contention, to section 4. It reads as follows:

That each corporation so organized shall have power under such rules and regulations as the Comptroller of the Currency may prescribe—

(1) To make advances upon, to discount, to rediscount, or purchase, and to sell or negotiate, with or without its indorsement or guaranty, notes, drafts, or bills of exchange and to accept drafts or bills of exchange, which—

I ask the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] if he is following me, to note the word "which"— which—

(a) Are issued or drawn for an agricultural purpose or the proceeds of which have been or are to be used for an agricultural purpose.

(b) Have a maturity at the time of discount, purchase, or acceptance not exceeding nine months.

(c) Are secured at the time of discount, purchase, or acceptance by warehouse receipts or other like documents conveying or securing title to nonperishable and readily marketable agricultural products.

Now, there is not a line in the bill authorizing the corporation to extend any relief to agriculture by direct loan except that provision, which provides that the loan must be for an agricultural purpose, the maturity must be not exceeding nine months, but that no loan for an agricultural purpose for nine months or any other length of time shall be made except it be secured by warehouse receipts upon nonperishable agricultural products that are readily marketable. So that the sole and exclusive function and business of the corporation in a purely agricultural section would be to lend to farmers for agricultural purposes only where the debt was secured by a warehouse receipt

That is all the business the bank can do. It can not lend to a farmer for the purpose of helping him to produce a crop. It can not make a loan to the farmer upon his land. It can not lend to the farmer upon his horses, his mules, his tractor, his wagons, his carts, or his farming implements, however valuable they may be. It can not lend to him upon his growing crop, although it may be planted and may be in a thriving condition and may promise large returns. It can not make a loan to the farmer upon personal security of any kind, or upon solvent indorsement. His character, his ability, and his reputation for thrift count for nothing in the transaction. The bank, so far as agricultural advances are concerned, can do no business under these provisions except to loan or discount paper secured by mortgage or lien for nonperishable, readily marketable agricultural products.

How does anyone expect a bank with no right to receive deposits, with such restrictions upon its power to do business, to get capital from the outside? If the farmers wish to raise money for the purpose of establishing a bank and desire the assistance of outside capital, they can go to the State and apply for a charter by the same general processes that are set up in the bill, and get it authorizing the creation of a bank for agricultural purposes in the main, with the right and privilege to do a general banking business, with less hampering requirements as to supervision, reserves, and so forth. Why should the farmer or why should outside investors in these circumstances invest their money in a bank of the sort proposed in the pending bill?

I now yield to the Senator from Michigan if he still desires to interrupt me.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not construe the bill as the Senator does. Subdivision (c), to which the Senator referred, under section 4, is a provision by which the bank can rediscount paper that is sent to it. It has the ordinary power, as I understand it, of the ordinary bank. It has the special privilege, which the ordinary bank does not have, of rediscounting such paper as that to which the Senator has referred. But that is only one subdivision relating to the powers of the bank.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator be so kind as to point out to me one word in the bill that authorizes them to receive deposits or do any kind of banking business except to lend money for agricultural purposes under conditions such as I have described? The provision with reference to advances on stock is more liberal, but I am now addressing myself to agricultural loans——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think it refers equally to nonperishable agricultural products as it does to stock raising. That is my understanding of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. The power to lend money upon notes for agricultural purposes upon nine months' maturity is limited by the terms of the bill which I have read to paper secured by agricultural products.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The bill gives the banking corporation to be created the power to charge the same rate the ordinary bank does.

Mr. SIMMONS. Where it makes a loan of the kind it is permitted to make.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It has the same advantages as to interest rates, then.

Mr. SIMMONS. I submit that the chairman of the committee will not contend that under the bill a bank could lend money for agricultural purposes except as I have indicated.

Mr. McLEAN. A bank?

Mr. SIMMONS. The bank which is to be created under the Capper bill.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator loses sight entirely of the new section 13a.

Mr. SIMMONS. At what page?

Mr. McLEAN. Page 35.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is with reference to loans by the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have already stated that I am not discussing at this time the proposed amendment of the Federal reserve act. I am discussing the provisions of the Capper bill outside of the amendments proposed to the Federal reserve act. I stated distinctly in the beginning that I would not at this time discuss the amendments which are proposed to the Federal reserve act and which I said are very valuable.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I beg the Senator's pardon. I supposed he was talking about the bill and the amendments which were reported to the committee and are now before the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am talking about the Capper bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Those provisions are in both bills.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know they are in both bills; but the bank which is authorized to be set up under the provisions of the Capper bill can not make an agricultural loan, as I understand it, unless that agricultural loan is secured by a warehouse receipt. Is not that true?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; that is true so far as those corporations are concerned. But if the Senator will take into consideration the amendments proposed to the Federal reserve act it will be seen that what we call growers' paper—notes secured by nothing except the character of the farmer if he wants the money for the purpose of buying fertilizer or horses or mules or implements—may be accepted. He can go to any bank and get his note for nine months discounted, and thus that note is eligible for rediscount in the Federal reserve bank.

We have gone to all lengths in the matter of extending credit to growers, far beyond anything that was recommended by the commission of agricultural inquiry, because they insisted that the limit should be six months; and yet upon further deliberation the committee felt that they would go to all lengths in extending to growers an accommodation of nine months' maturity.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, yes; but that, if the Senator will pardon me, is a loan to be made by a Federal reserve bank.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; by the bank.

Mr. SIMMONS. And not by the bank about which I am talking; not by the bank permitted to be set up under the bill.

Mr. McLEAN. Not by the Federal reserve bank, but by a member bank; any bank that is a member of the Federal reserve system.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; but these Capper bill banks are not to be members of the Federal reserve system.

Mr. McLEAN. No; we did not intend that they should be. They are finance corporations.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me call the Senator's attention to section 13a, and that is very valuable. I will say to the Senator that I am exceedingly glad we are to have an amendment of that sort to the Federal reserve act. It reads:

> Upon the indorsement of any of its member banks, which shall be deemed a waiver of demand, notice, and protest by such bank as to its own indorsement exclusively, any Federal reserve bank may discount notes, drafts, and bills of exchange issued or drawn for an agricultural purpose or based upon live stock and having a maturity, at the time of discount, exclusive of days of grace, not exceeding nine months.

That is a loan authorized to be made by the Federal reserve bank. That is not a loan authorized to be made by one of the agricultural credit banks. That is the point I am making. I am making the point that the credit banks are not authorized, under the terms of the bill, either expressly or impliedly, to lend money upon agricultural paper, except when secured by a warehouse receipt.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator even there is confining the limits of the bill to chattel mortgages or other like instruments.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is as to live stock.

Mr. McLEAN. Not necessarily.

Mr. SIMMONS. The very language confines it to live stock, if the Senator will pardon me. The language then proceeds:

> Or by chattel mortgages or other like instruments conferring a first and paramount lien upon live stock which are being fattened for market.

That is the provision defining the powers of the proposed rural credit corporations or banks proposed to be created by the Capper bill with loans to stock raisers.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. There is other language in connection with the term "warehouse receipts" which the Senator from North Carolina does not seem to take into consideration.

Mr. SIMMONS. "Or other like documents."

Mr. STERLING. The language to which I refer is—> warehouse receipts or other like documents conveying or securing title to nonperishable and readily marketable agricultural products.

Of course, there may be something else than the warehouse receipts, distinctively so known, upon which he may procure a loan—other documents conveying or securing title than warehouse receipts. A warehouse receipt is evidence of his title to so much grain in the warehouse. So a bill of sale is evidence of his title to the property.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator is right in that the paper must be secured.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; the paper must be secured and it must be secured by warehouse receipts or other documents covering nonperishable agricultural products—warehouse receipts or other documents conveying or securing title. What is the difference? There is no difference, of course. We may have a warehouse receipt or some other document conveying the same title, but the point I am making is that it is confined to nonperishable, readily marketable agricultural products—things already produced. It makes no difference whether the pledge of the property is by warehouse receipt or other conveyance of title.

Mr. STERLING. My idea was simply that it should not be confined to warehouse receipts; and the Senator from North Carolina, I think, shares that impression.

Mr. SIMMONS. The same principle is applicable, no matter whether the particular paper taken is a warehouse receipt, chattel mortgage, or any other "like document." The language is "warehouse receipts or other like documents conveying or securing title to nonperishable and readily marketable agricultural products." So what I said holds. Not a dollar may be loaned by these proposed credit corporations for agricultural purposes, for nine months or any other length of time, unless the loan be secured by a mortgage or warehouse receipt upon "nonperishable and readily marketable agricultural products," which means, of course, that the crop must be produced, the thing must be in existence, it must be nonperishable, and it must be readily marketable. That is the limitation upon the power of these institutions to lend money for agricultural purposes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator believe that such loans should be made without security?

Mr. SIMMONS. They must be made upon this particular security the bill provides; they may not be made upon any other kind of property.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask the Senator does he believe that the banks should be authorized to loan without adequate security?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly not; but if the bank is to be of any service to the farmer, if it is to be sufficiently profit-earning to induce capital to enter into it, so as to make it feasible and practicable to establish such banks, if it is to be either beneficial to the farmer, in fact, if it is to ever come into existence, I think we shall have to broaden its lending powers and not limit them to lending money to farmers upon the conveyance of title to "nonperishable and readily marketable agricultural products" which have already been produced. We have got to extend the power of the bank to lend money to farmers upon any security which may be adequate and may be approved, for the purpose of enabling them not only to sell the crops they have already produced but to finance the making of the crops which will never be produced unless the farmers can finance their production.

Mr. CAPPER. If the Senator from North Carolina will yield, I desire to say that I hope he will keep in mind the fact that the agencies set up in title 1 are not banks, and it is not contemplated that they shall attempt to do what is commonly known as a banking business or to take care of production credits.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to have the Senator who introduced the pending bill or the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency to answer a question. It does not make any difference whether the $250,000 capitalized primary lending institutions which the bill authorizes to be established be called banks or corporations, for they are intended to perform some of the functions of a bank and some of the functions of a corporation, and may be called one or the other; but do the Senators or any of those who have interrupted me contend that under the terms of the pending bill those institutions will be able to advance money to farmers for agricultural purposes except it be upon security in the nature of a lien or a mortgage or a warehouse receipt upon "nonperishable and readily marketable agricultural products"? Do those Senators contend that those institutions will have any power to lend money upon the security of any property other than that I have specified, or will have any power to receive deposits or to conduct general loaning or banking business? As I have indicated, by the very terms of this bill, which, of course, will be subject to strict construction, will not their lending power for agricultural purposes be restricted to the security upon the class of products to which I have referred? I ask the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency if that is not true?

Mr. McLEAN. I think the Senator from North Carolina is right.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then we have that point established. It is true that the committee has inserted in the bill—and I thank him for it and I thank the committee on Banking and Currency for it—an amendment greatly enlarging the functions of the Federal reserve banks and their member banks with reference to making loans to farmers. It is very valuable; but those are loans which the member bank of the Federal reserve system is authorized to make to farmers and not loans which are authorized to be made by the proposed rural-credit corporations which the Capper bill sets up. I am glad we now have that distinction well established.

Mr. President, I wish to ask as a practical business question, is it conceivable that outside capital would furnish the money to establish the proposed banks in view of their narrow and limited power to carry on business, for they are limited to loans to stock raisers and farmers and can only loan to a farmer on pledge or conveyance of nonperishable farm product already produced and ready for market.

The banks proposed to be created must have a paid-in capital of $250,000 each, and when the farmers succeed in getting the money for such a bank and it is paid in, one-fourth of it must be taken out and deposited with the Federal reserve bank as a reserve fund, and if the farm-credit bank creates an indebtedness it must increase its reserve fund in the Federal reserve bank, so that, including the 25 per cent, it will always equal 7½ per cent of the entire indebtedness of the corporation.

I am not going to stop at this point to criticize that feature, but it is a very strange thing to me that this provision with reference to reserves should have been put into this bill. If it were thought necessary to require these banks to use one-fourth of their capital as reserve, why did the bill require these funds of the farmers, so to speak, this money raised for the purpose of financing the operations of agriculture, to be placed in the Federal reserve banks, thereby using the farmers' money for the purpose of swelling the rediscount resources of the commercial system?

There is proposed to be set up here in juxtaposition with this primary bank a rediscount farmers' corporation with a capital of a million dollars. Its function, and its sole function under this bill, is to rediscount the paper of the primary credit corporation or bank; it is the reservoir from which the primary banks may draw their means to finance their customers, just as the Federal reserve banks constitute the reservoir from which the member banks of that system may draw in case of need. Why does not the bill permit the reserve fund of 25 per cent which is exacted from the primary corporations or banks of this new system to be deposited with the rediscount agricultual banks and thereby strengthen the reservoir from which they may by drawing rediscounts supply the cash requirements instead of putting it in the commercial banks?

Mr. McLEAN. As to the million-dollar bank, the rediscount bank, it is not required to have any reserve at all, and sound banking would require that there should be a liquid reserve for the system somewhere. So the bill requires that such reserve shall be kept by the smaller banks, and it might as well be kept in the Federal reserve system as anywhere else, because it can not be used.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, let me get another thought before the Senate. I was happy to make clear to the Senate the other proposition which I have presented. The system proposed to be set up for the farmers by the pending bill is championed by the chairman of the agricultural bloc in this body. It is analogous in its framework to the Federal reserve system. It has its member banks, namely, the $250,000 primary banks; it has its parent bank, to wit, the million-dollar rediscount bank. One is a local bank; the other is a rediscounting bank. The rediscount bank takes the place of the Federal reserve bank; the lending bank takes the place of the member bank in the Federal reserve system. When the member bank in the Federal reserve system is required to deposit a reserve, it deposits it with the Federal reserve bank. That is its discount bank; and that strengthens that bank.

Now, when we come to a farmers' system it seems to me—and if I am wrong about it I wish to be put right—if we are going to require the member corporation, so to speak, the primary lending bank, to take one-fourth of its funds and put them in a reserve fund to be deposited somewhere else, by analogy with the Federal reserve system, the bill ought to require that that reserve fund shall be deposited in this rediscount bank, thereby strengthening and augmenting its ability to aid the primary institutions of the system. It seems to me that the farmer is done an injustice when this reserve fund, which comes out of the capital he invests in his primary lending bank, is deposited in the Federal reserve bank instead of the rediscounting banks of the new system.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, it is desirable to have a reserve somewhere.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not objecting to a reserve; I am objecting to its diversion from the farm credit system.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator will concede that there should be a liquid reserve somewhere.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not objecting to a reserve. The Senator does not understand me as making any objection or any criticism as to the reserve. It is all right. It is intended to secure the creditors of these banks, and it is all right. The point I am making is that you ought not to take this fund that is part of the farmer's financing fund and deposit it in an agency of the commercial banking system. You ought to deposit it in the rediscounting bank which you have set up for the benefit of the farmer and as a part of your rural credit system.

Mr. McLEAN. It would not add to the rediscounting power of the smaller bank to require that its reserves be deposited with the parent bank. It would not add a dollar to its money-lending facilities or power. The Senator can see that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator from Connecticut mean to say that all the reserves that are deposited in the Federal reserve banks do not in any way strengthen those institutions?

Mr. SMOOT. They do not weaken the banks, however.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; but they strengthen those institutions instead of strengthening the institution of the farmer. You have set up here one system for your commercial bank, and you are proposing to set up another system for agriculture. I do not want you to undermine that in any way. I do not want you to take any prop from under it. I do not want you to use the farmers' fund for the purpose of strengthening some other system.

Mr. McLEAN. The smaller banks can discount up to ten times their capital and surplus. No limit at all is put upon the parent bank. There is no trouble about the parent bank discounting any quantity of paper that is presented by the smaller banks, provided it is approved by the Federal Reserve Board; so that it would not strengthen the smaller banks a particle if they kept their reserves with the parent bank. Moreover, the law provides that the Federal reserve banks may purchase the acceptances of the parent bank, the million-dollar bank, and there you complete your chain; and it seemed to the committee that it was altogether proper that these reserves should be kept with the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course, I do not agree with the Senator, and I ask if he can show any reason why these reserves should not be kept with the farmers' rediscounting institutions?

Mr. McLEAN. I know of no reason why they should be kept with the parent bank. It would not benefit the smaller banks a particle; and in view of the fact, as I have just said, that the Federal reserve banks may purchase the acceptances of the large banks whenever they think the public interests require it, it is entirely proper that the reserves should be kept with the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, Mr. President, that is beside the point. It is true, of course, that there is a provision in the amendment which the committee proposes to the Federal reserve system that authorizes the Federal reserve banks in certain conditions to purchase or to rediscount the paper of the rediscount agricultural credit associations; but that is the only provision there is in the bill for the rediscounting by the Federal Reserve Board of any of the paper of these agricultural banks, either the primary bank or the rediscount bank. Here is the provision:

> That the Federal reserve act, as amended, be further amended by adding at the end of section 14 a new paragraph, as follows:
> "(f) To purchase and sell in the open market, either from or to domestic banks, firms, corporations, or individuals, acceptances of corporations organized under the Federal agricultural credits act whenever the Federal Reserve Board shall declare that the public interest so requires."

There is not a line in this bill that directly provides that either the small bank or the big agricultural bank can discount its paper with the Federal reserve banks, except the provision that in case the Federal Reserve Board shall find and declare that the public interest requires that that be done, it may then be done. In other words, if a war emergency or some other condition of things more distressing than the present doleful state of affairs in agriculture shall happen, then, to save the situation, as an emergency measure, the board may, if it can be persuaded and if the financial interests will permit it, declare that there is a public necessity for the rediscount of this paper by the Federal reserve bank, and then it may rediscount it, and not until then. With the rediscounting powers of the Federal reserve bank as broad as they are for the accommodation of commercial interests, when the farmer's paper comes there, and comes through a bank created by the Federal Government under the protection of the Federal Government, why should it be necessary to gather together that board and to convince them that a very exceptional and extraordinary situation has been created in order that the farmer's paper may enter the sacred portals of the commercial reserve banks of the country?

Mr. McLEAN. Of course, the Senator knows that we are not creating commercial banks. We are creating these new corporations.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; and why such iniquities, why such injustice, why such discrimination against the farmer?

Mr. McLEAN. We can not give them all the privileges of the member banks when they are in no sense banks. They can not accept deposits. They are organized merely for the purpose of financing particularly the cooperative marketing associations; and there is great need, as it seems to the committee, of establishing organizations for that purpose.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, you permit them to lend money. You permit them to discount paper. You assume control and supervision over them. You have them examined. You require them to deposit with the Government a reserve fund to secure their obligations and their notes, and yet you say that they are not banks in the sense that the paper which has come into being through an instrumentality that you provide is not entitled to equal participation in the benefits of your Federal reserve discounting system.

Mr. McLEAN. We did not believe that it was sound banking or proper to give to these institutions all the benefits and rediscounting privileges that the member banks of the country have.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, that is beside the question. It may not be proper to confer upon them the broad functions of banking that you have conferred upon the commercial banks. I think it is, but in your judgment it may not be proper; but you have found that it was proper to confer upon them certain banking functions, the power to do certain things, and very important things, that banks do, and that power involves the issuance of paper and the discount of notes; and to carry on that system which you have inaugurated they ought to have the same privileges of rediscount with the Federal reserve system which is given to like paper and like business when carried on by the member banks of the Federal reserve system.

Mr. McLEAN. The committee felt—and I think the committee was entirely right in its conclusion—that these institutions, if they wanted to receive the benefits of the Federal reserve system, should organize banks, and not these finance corporations. If they want to do a banking business, let them organize as banks. Their capital of $250,000 renders them eligible, and there is no objection to their doing that; but we felt that it was a very promising experiment to try to organize these rediscounting corporations for the purpose of accommodating the cooperative marketing associations.

I know that in my section of the country the growers of tobacco have recently formed a large cooperative association. They have succeeded in getting their accommodations at the banks, to be sure; but had one of these large corporations been formed it is quite probable that they could have gotten their accommodations there, possibly at a lower rate of interest. It is unwise to invite a pyramiding of these rediscounts, first in the primary bank or the smaller bank, then to rediscount with the parent bank, and then for the parent bank to take it to the Federal reserve bank. It seemed to the committee that it was unwise to confer upon these corporations all the powers and privileges of rediscount which the national banks now have, and I think it is unwise.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is merely the Senator's opinion, of course, and I find no argument to support it in what he has just said. I have pursued that line of argument as far as I care to and I am satisfied to let it rest there.

Mr. President, when I was diverted into the discussion of this reserve provision of the bill I was laying down the proposition that it was perfectly evident from a business standpoint that this measure, so far as it seeks to help agriculture as such, probably would be found inoperative, and would seldom, if ever, be invoked. I think that is too clear to require further demonstration. There would be no way to get the money to set up these banks. The farmer does not have it. If he had it there would be very little inducement to put it in. The outside investor will not do it because the business which the corporation may do—and I am speaking of a strictly agricultural community, not of a stock-raising community—is so limited and so narrow that there is really no prospect of profit. Besides, if the farmer wants to establish an institution, and he can raise the money for the purpose for which these corporations are proposed to be created, he can get a charter from his State just as well as he can from the Federal Government, and a charter which will not so circumscribe and limit his activities.

Under this bill he is denied the right to receive deposits. Deposits constitute largely the money with which commercial banks do their business. The only means these banks have of increasing their capital is to sell more stock or to sell debentures, and incur debt. Whether those debentures will be salable in the markets or not, I think is exceedingly questionable. I doubt very much whether they would meet any ready response in the market unless the interest rates were exceedingly high, because the privilege of exemption from taxation, which is conferred upon the farm-loan banks, and even the joint-stock lands banks, is denied to these banks. The only source of funds, therefore, is through the creation of debts, and they can only borrow upon bonds. They can not borrow upon their notes at the commercial banks. They are not authorized to borrow money except upon debentures secured by such collaterals as they may take in the course of their business.

Denied these powers to do business generally, out of which great profits can be made in case they should get a charter for a State bank, does anybody believe that they would deliberately invest their money in a Federal bank with these limited powers, when by investing their money in a State bank they might do everything that is provided in this bill as permissible for the corporation to do, and, in addition to that, might carry on the general business of a banking and trust company?

But suppose we concede that these banks will be attractive investments, which they will not be, and that they will be established all over the country, which they will not be, and that they will furnish to the farmers of the United States abundant credits for the purpose of marketing and distributing their products. Even so, is that all the relief the farmers of this country are asking or are to get from the Congress? Is the financing of the distribution of the farmer's crop the main trouble with which he now struggles and labors?

Are there not outside of this system reasonably adequate facilities with which the farmer can finance this part of his operations? The cooperative associations which this bill permits to take the benefit and advantage of this act—these cooperative associations, created for the purpose of marketing and selling the farmer's products, are coming rapidly into being all over the country, and I take it that within a very short time especially the nonperishable crops of this country will be largely sold through those associations. They will become the great distributing agencies of farm products in this country. They largely are now, in some parts of the country. They are functioning splendidly. But I do not think they are in any great distress about getting money.

There is nothing I can see in the Federal reserve system which interferes with their getting relief through it. They have the farmer's products in their hands. Is it cotton? Is it tobacco? It has been turned over to them. The legal title has been vested in them upon the making of a small cash payment. They have a perfect right to mortgage or pledge it to secure money. They need to secure it at one time for only enough to make one payment—first the advance payment, then the first deferred payment, then the second deferred payment, and then the last deferred payment. These payments come in regular order. When they pledge the crop for the first payment, the whole crop is mortgaged and the security is superabundant. When they have sold off a part, the loan made to get the money for the first payment is canceled, and then they have the balance of the crop to secure the second deferred payment; and the process goes on until the end.

The point I am making is that there is in the hands of these associations an abundance of the very best security in the world, and all they need is a loan for three months for the next deferred payment, and that they can secure from the Federal reserve banks through their member banks or the War Finance Corporation, because their paper is eligible paper. But independently of the Federal reserve bank, I do not think these cooperative associations have found any difficulty in getting advances upon these products to finance their distribution by orderly marketing processes.

It is not a matter of borrowing money when the crop is made and harvested. When the crop is harvested the farmer has something to sell to get money. He has tangible security to offer for a loan, if he does not wish to sell. He is not in any particular distress with reference to borrowing money upon the pledge of his finished product. That is not the time when he is in need of money. The time when he needs money and can not get it is when he is making that crop. He needs money to buy his horses and his mules, to buy his tractors, to buy his trucks, to buy his farming implements, to buy the seed which he plants, to pay for the labor employed in the making of his crop. For nine long months, beginning with January and ending about October, the farmer is spending money from day to day, not little money, but big money, in the preparation of his land, in the cultivation of his crops, in the harvesting of his crops, and during that time no money is coming in from any source whatsoever. It is to meet these daily expenditures, when he is getting no money, when he has nothing to sell, when he is engaged in the intensive and expensive processes of production, that he needs help. He does not so much need help when his labors are finished, when his daily expenditures are over, when his product is ready for the market, and the market is ready to take it.

I want to ask the sponsor of this bill, who sits before me, Senator CAPPER, if there is one line in his bill, if there is one syllable in his bill, which provides for lending one dollar to the farmer for the purpose of enabling him to produce a crop? And I wish to remind him that it must be obvious to him and everybody that if the farmer can not finance the production of his crops there will be no products upon which he can borrow money.

Mr. CAPPER. I will say to the Senator that we do not undertake to handle production credits through the machinery set up by this bill. This measure simply undertakes to aid in the orderly marketing of the products of the farm by creating these agricultural credit corporations and the rediscount corporations which will handle the farmer's paper, and it liberalizes the banking machinery we already have with reference to agricultural paper, widens the door to the Federal reserve bank, and enlarges the opportunities for the marketing of a certain class of agricultural paper, which will probably be of longer maturity, and which as a rule banks now are not anxious to handle. They prefer the short-time, liquid paper, but we undertake now to find another outlet through these agricultural credit corporations and through these larger rediscount corporations for that large volume of paper which as a rule probably would run from six to nine months and which is confined largely to the marketing of the products of the farm and to the live-stock industry.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I will concede that the bill is much more liberal in its terms with reference to financing the live-stock industry. The point I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate is that there is a strange omission in this bill. I had understood that the representatives of the farm bloc were proposing to deal with these problems in a broad and generous way toward the farmer, but there is a strange omission in the bill to provide any means by which the farmer can obtain credit to enable him to make his crop. After he has made his crop this bill provides, as do other bills, a source from which he can get credit. But when it deals with the farmer, even after he has made the crop, it allows him to discount his paper with his bank only upon his giving security upon his crop.

It does not even permit him to take advantage of this system for the purpose of borrowing money upon his own credit, upon his personal property other than his crops, or upon personal indorsement, in case it should be convenient for him to present solvent indorsements. It seems to me it deals very hardly with the real farmers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered, and the Senator from North Carolina will proceed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. When the original draft of the bill under consideration was first presented to an assemblage of Senators, who heard it advocated by representatives of the National Live Stock Association, I called attention to the fact that while it did, as now suggested by the Senator from North Carolina, seem to make provision for the necessities of the live-stock growers, and also made provision for borrowing the money on crops that had already been made, it did not cover the entire ground, in that it contained no provision whatever, so far as I have been able to discover, that would provide for the financing of the producing of the crop.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the point I am making.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not imagine that the friends of the measure would contend for it that it meets that phase of the situation at all. I assume, however, that this is not to be considered as the complete legislation dealing with the subject of rural credits, and that the phase to which I have adverted, namely, the financing of the farmer in the producing of the crop, is to be taken care of in the bill which, as I understand, will follow the consideration of the pending measure.

Mr. SIMMONS. That may be true, but why wait? If the farmer is permitted in the pending bill to set up this sort of banking institution, why is he to be denied the benefit of going to it to secure credit for the expenses of crop production? I am a bit skeptical as to what further bills may be enacted to give the farmer the relief denied him in the pending measure. Of course, it may be that the farmer will be given access to some other agency under some other legislation intended for the purpose of financing his production, just as the stock raiser is given access to some other agency to aid him in financing his operations. But when we are setting up a system under which the farmer is to furnish the money in order to finance the bank or the corporation, why not permit him to go to that institution for credit as well as to the other institutions? The stock raiser is permitted to go to both, the cooperative association is permitted to go to both, but the farmer is not permitted to go to this institution, which he creates himself, except when he goes with a mortgage in his hand upon a crop already produced.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I concede that it would be very much more satisfactory to me, and I dare say to most of those who are vitally interested in the financing of the producing of the farmers' crops, if the provisions to that end were incorporated in the one measure. It seems to me that they might very properly be so incorporated. It seems to me, though, that the pending bill, as it is framed, could not very well meet the conditions to which the Senator has adverted, namely, the financing of the production of the crop by the farmer. It seems to have an entirely different object. I would like to see incorporated in the pending bill, so we would not have to take chances upon some other bill which may not be as popular in the Senate as is the Capper bill, provisions for financing the farmers' operations in the production of crops. But if we dispose of the pending measure and then take up the other bill, I hope we may be able thus to take care of the situation.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator sees my point. Here is a Federal corporation that is proposed to be set up and the farmer is supposed to raise the money, either himself or through his friends, to finance it. It might be a very great benefit to the farmer provided it could be financed and provided its functions were sufficiently broad to accommodate his needs and requirements. If, by reason of the narrowness of the functions of the corporation we are endeavoring to create, the farmer loses the opportunity, of what avail would it be? What I have in mind is sufficiently to broaden the field of the operation of the corporation organized in an agricultural district so as to enable it to function and make money, and thereby create an inducement to capital to invest in it so that we may have some assurance that the institutions will be established and that the farmers will get the benefit of them.

I concede very readily there would be no trouble in the large stock-growing sections of the country in raising the money necessary to establish the institutions, and I concede the powers given to lend to stock raisers probably will be amply sufficient to meet their requirements. But in a section like my State, or like the whole South, for that matter, where there is relatively little stock raising, where it is altogether agricultural, I am convinced that unless we shall broaden those powers so as to let the bank do more business and let it cover all the requirements of the farmer we shall never be able to put it in operation in those sections, and, beneficial as it might be, as now written it will be of little or no benefit to the farmers in these States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an interruption——

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I fully agree with him. I can not perceive that the bill would be of any particular benefit to the farmers in his section of the country, peculiar as is the system of agriculture there. We are in very much the same situation in our section. The bill would undoubtedly be of assistance to those of our people who are engaged in stock raising upon a relatively large scale. It would be of no assistance whatever, as I have indicated heretofore, to the very considerable portion of our population who are in exactly the same situation as are the farmers in the State of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. And it would never be organized in those sections.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is quite right. I agree fully to that. But what troubles me is that it seems to me it would be scarcely practicable to so mold these corporations, the organization of which is provided for by the bill, as to afford the assistance needed in the financing of the crop-producing operation. The bill contemplates the organization of corporations which will take mortgages upon actual, tangible, marketable property, namely, live stock. That is a transaction which is quite different from the financing of the production of a crop, which can afford no real, substantial security and which must rest very largely upon the character and ability of the farmer himself. If he has live stock or if he has machinery, collateral of some sort that will afford a basis for a mortgage, or something of that kind, he will probably be able to raise the money; but in most instances the loans which are made to him are made simply upon the expectation that by his industry and application and his knowledge of the business he will be able to raise the crop and repay the money when it is raised. So it occurs to me that it would be difficult to mold these particular corporations so as to make them the instrumentalities for providing loans to farmers for the purpose of producing their crops.

Mr. SIMMONS. As I understand the Senator, the point that he makes is that the farmer has no security until his crop is made and put in the warehouse or in a condition that it may be covered by a mortgage which he can give and which ought to be accepted by these corporations. I think that is an erroneous assumption upon the part of the Senator.

Years ago, before the Federal reserve banks were created, before the war, I will say, the farmers of my section of the country were not having any particular trouble in financing themselves through the national banking system. They were not confined in the matter of loans to three-months paper, six-months paper, or nine-months paper. The banks could lend upon any maturity of paper that they saw fit to lend upon. They could lend upon any kind of good security. They could lend upon any kind of good security, and the farmers had no difficulty in going to those banks, and, by executing a mortgage upon their personal property, their mules, horses, farming implements, tools, vehicles, or growing crops, getting the money with which to plant and cultivate and harvest their crops. I happened during that period to be the attorney of a national bank in my city, and I know the portfolios and vaults of that bank were full of mortgages in the nature of crop liens and personal-property securities.

The difficulty arose when the Federal reserve system was inaugurated and when it became necessary in order to secure money through the Federal reserve bank to present that bank with paper of short maturity. Then the country bank that was created for the purpose of serving the farmer soon found that it could not do business on the farmers' paper with their correspondent bank in the nearest large city, because if it lent to the farmers on nine-months paper and carried the paper to the Federal reserve bank for the purpose of getting it rediscounted, it was held to be ineligible. So that old system was all broken up, and the farmer was no longer able to raise money through the banking instrumentalities in his section of the country for the purpose of financing his crops.

Mr. President, why should the argument be made here that such paper would not afford sufficient security? The banks of the South and of the agricultural sections did not, under the conditions I have recited, consider it insufficient security. The insufficiency of the security is not the reason that crop liens and personal-property mortgages are not eligible for loans now. The reason is because they are not "liquid" in the sense that they are 9 months' paper or 12 months' paper and for that fact ineligible for rediscount in the Federal reserve bank, which is now the great source of credit in the United States; indeed, it has become practically the only source of credit in the country.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me finish this sentence. The Senator will please pardon me until I shall have concluded the statement of this idea.

The banks of the country did not think such paper insufficient security; I do not think it now; and it is not true. Senators may say the crop has not yet been produced; that it is only in the process of production; that there is nothing in existence upon which to base the loan, and therefore the farmer is not entitled to any credit upon that.

But let us by way of comparison and analogy consider our commercial banking system. A great manufacturing plant is incorporated; it is mortgaged and bonded for every dollar, probably, that the plant is worth or that its tangible assets are worth; but it is a going concern; it is well managed; it has a big trade; there is a ready demand for its products, though they are not in existence. Such manufacturing institutions are among the greatest borrowers of money in the United States. Banks do not lend to them upon the face of their existent property only, of their plant, of their tangible assets, for those are practically all mortgaged and bonded for all they are worth. These banks lend and accommodate those great industries of the United States in part upon their credit; upon the fact that they are going concerns; upon the fact that it is estimated that when they shall have fabricated the material which they are engaged in producing and shall have put it upon the market there will be profits and big profits.

When, however, we come to the farmer the situation is different it seems, although he is equipped with his live stock; he is equipped with his lands; he is equipped with his agricultural implements; he buys his seed, and he plants his crop. Has agriculture failed in America? Do not the statistics show that the products of agriculture are in demand and readily marketable? Do not the facts show that agricultural products are still very valuable in the markets of the world to-day?

Why should the farmer not be entitled to credit upon his character as a man; upon his reputation for thrift; upon his reputation for ability in his business? Why should he not be entitled to the same treatment for those reasons as is the manufacturer? Why should it be assumed as to the thing which he is engaged in producing, to which he is lending his energies and incurring the production expenses for nine long months incident to planting, cultivating, and harvesting the crop, that it does not before production is complete furnish any safe security for credit? Why should the manufacturer be given, as he is given every day in the year, enormous credits based upon his prospective earnings in the fabrication and marketing of materials that may be at the time of the loan in the bowels of the earth and have no existence, or at most, in process, and the farmer be given no credit for the prospective earnings and the prospective output of his labors in the cultivation of the soil?

Mr. President, the farmer has at least just as good a basis for credit on the prospective earnings of his planted crops as has the manufacturer a basis of credit upon the prospects of earnings in the manipulation of the raw material which in some instances he has not yet purchased and which probably is where nature has placed it. There is no reason for this discrimination except the disposition to discredit agriculture and to place it and keep it under the ban of credit suspicion.

I say there is no foundation for such a discrimination, and it is a rank outrage and an injustice to the greatest and most vital industry in the world to say here upon the floor of the Senate of the United States that not a dollar may be safely lent by a bank which the Government is about to set up upon the faith of a nine months' expenditure and nine months' labor of a farmer who is engaged in the cultivation of the soil, but that it is perfectly safe and good banking for some other Federal bank to lend millions piled upon millions of dollars upon the faith of the earning capacity and the integrity of a manufacturing establishment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have been very much interested in what the Senator from North Carolina has been saying. Unquestionably the vice which he has pointed out in the bill, namely, that it will not help many of the producers of the country, absolutely exists. I think the bill virtually applies merely to the live-stock business, as the Senator has stated.

I now wish to call the Senator's attention to a situation which exists in his State and in mine in reference to this matter.

As the Senator knows, in our section of the country commission merchants, commonly called cotton factors, lend money all through the spring and early summer to the farmers for the purpose of enabling them to produce their crops. That is the universal system in my State, and I am rather inclined to believe that it is the universal custom in the State of the Senator from North Carolina. Under the original Federal reserve act it was thought that cotton factors' paper would be eligible for rediscount as the paper of any other merchant is so eligible, and that act was so construed for the first five years of its existence, but later on, about two years ago, the Federal Reserve Board held that factors' paper was not eligible for rediscount; the right to discount was taken away from the factors, and in that way the farmers were deprived in a measure—and in a considerable measure—of the ability to obtain money with which to produce their crops. In that situation I offered an amendment here some time ago to another measure, and I intend to offer a similar amendment to the pending bill, which I will read to the Senator:

And the notes, drafts, and bills of exchange of factors making advances exclusively to the producers of staple agricultural products in their raw state shall be eligible for such discount.

That amendment was prepared by the Federal Reserve Board; it was indorsed by them, and it was indorsed by the Secretary of the Treasury; but I have never been able to prevail upon the Banking and Currency Committee to report it. So I shall offer it as an amendment to the pending bill. The question I wish to propound to the Senator is, Would not such an amendment be somewhat in line with the contention the Senator is making now, that we should make better provision for the producers of crops?

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, it would help. It may be, however, that there is a provision, not in the so-called Capper bill proper but in the amendments proposed to the Federal reserve system in the bill as it has been reported, that probably may reach that stiuation.

Mr. McKELLAR. No.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will not contend that it will, but I wish to call the attention of the Senator to it so that he may read it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is on page 37, beginning in line 3, and is among the proposed amendments to the Federal reserve act.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will examine it again, but my hasty examination led me to believe that it referred to something different.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am very much in favor of the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee, but I think the provision to which I have referred may cover it. If it does not I shall be glad to cooperate with the able Senator from Tennessee in favor of a clear provision in that behalf.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, as a matter of fact, the Senator from Tennessee had an opportunity to propose his amendment last year and did propose it, but the Senate voted it down. The Federal Reserve Board approved the amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. And the Senator offered it in the open Senate, but it was voted down. I voted for it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I recall that fact. I am going to offer it to the Senate again, because it will have the effect of providing in part at least for the very situation which the Senator from North Carolina has so well brought out during the course of the debate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I invite the Senator's attention to the section to which I have referred.

Mr. McKELLAR. What section is that?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is on page 37, beginning in line 3, and is, I believe, a part of section 13a.

Mr. McKELLAR. That provision would not apply.

Mr. SIMMONS. Probably it would not; I am not sure about that, but I have not time to read it now.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will not ask the Senator to read it. I am much obliged to him for allowing the interruption. I may say, however, that the language to which he refers on page 37 covers a different matter and relates purely to cooperative marketing associations.

Mr. SIMMONS. Probably that is true. I am in hearty sympathy, however, with the purpose of the Senator from Tennessee; and if the amendment to which I have referred does not cover the situation which the Senator from Tennessee desires covered, I hope his amendment may be adopted.

At the proper time—not now—I am going to propose an amendment to section 4 of the bill to which I have so often referred and from which I read the section relating to and limiting the powers of the corporations proposed to be created by this bill, and which authorizes loans to the farmers only when secured by warehouse receipts or mortgages upon nonperishable readily marketable agricultural products. The amendment I shall offer will be designed to enlarge those powers and afford the producer, as well as the distributor, of farm products some relief and some credit.

I was present during the hearings before the Banking and Currency Committee on this bill. A large part of the testimony, at any rate, before that committee was certain expert testimony furnished by the departments, chiefly by the Treasury Department. The witnesses dealt almost entirely in their statements with the necessity of financing the distributors of farm products. I tried, but did not succeed in my effort, to get them to give a bit of consideration to financing the production of farm products, which is a process that precedes distribution; indeed, without production there of course can be no distribution.

I desire to broaden the provisions of the bill so as to give to the corporations to be created the power to lend some money, at least, to the farmer that will help him in the production of his crop; and I propose to do that—I may change this language, but it gives my thought—by adding, after the words "securing title to nonperishable and readily marketable agricultural products," substantially the words "or by chattel mortgage on readily salable personal property, or by hypothecation of collaterals of adequate value, or approved personal indorsement of at least two persons."

Up to the present time no means for supplying the farmer's need has been provided, and even if the Lenroot bill should be passed it would furnish inadequate means. I want to see the farmer provided with ample funds in the production of his crop, because we all know that the economies which measure the difference between success and failure in any business depend very largely upon proper equipment and proper financing to enable the producer of the product, whatever its character may be, to employ not only the best and most economical methods and equipments of production, but the ability to purchase and supply those things that are requisite to that end at the lowest price. The farmer is not able in many instances to conduct his business successfully because he has not the means, the money, with which to conduct his business economically. If he buys—and he must buy extensively—he has to buy on time and pay excessive time prices. He has not the means to purchase for cash the modern improvements and implements that are essential to the most successful and economical cultivation of the soil; and therefore he is not able to conduct his business with economy and efficiency essential to enable him to realize from it the returns and profits to which he is entitled.

I wish to see him put in a position where he will have no difficulty about this—to him—most important matter. The only objection that has been urged heretofore to the broadening of the power of these corporations so as to enable them to accommodate the farmer in this respect is that he has no adequate security to offer; that he comes into possession of security only after his crop is produced. I am going to provide here that he shall be lent, not upon crop prospects—although I think that is very good security, just as good as a loan made upon the earning capacity of a manufacturing plant—but that if, in order to get this money to produce his crop, he can offer security of a character that is now recognized by the commercial banks of the country as perfectly safe, the reason that prevents these banks from lending to him for this purpose will be removed.

Certainly, Mr. President, under the terms of the amendment which I propose, the money which is lent to the farmer to enable him to make his crop may be just as well secured as the money which is lent to the farmer to enable him to distribute his crop after it is made. I can see no reason why the Senate should not readily adopt that amendment; and if that amendment should be adopted, then I think the probability of the establishment of these banks in the agricultural sections would be greatly increased, and I am sure that the operation of these banks where they are established in the agricultural country would be, in its benefits to the farmers, enormously enhanced.

As I said at the outset, I have not been discussing this bill from the standpoint of opposition to its passage by the Senate. I suppose it will be enacted. I suppose I shall vote for it, as other Senators who see its defects will vote for it, because there is some good in it. What I want to emphasize is that I object to having to vote for provisions in a bill that my judgment and my common sense tell me are a fake and a fraud and a pretense, a vain and foolish thing, that can not accomplish the purpose which it is professed it is desired to accomplish.

I hate fraud and I hate pretense. I hate the very idea of voting for legislation knowing that it will be deceptive, that it will mislead, that it will give rise to a hope that will never be realized, subjecting us to the imputation of legislating here only to placate a dissatisfaction in the country, and legislating in a way that is mere gesture and pretense so far as meeting the cause of discontent is concerned.

I do not think I would vote for this bill at all, Mr. President, if it were not for the amendments to the Federal reserve act and to the farm loan act, which form a sort of appendix to the bill, and which really bear no relation to and have no connection with the institution which the bill itself undertakes to set up. I realize, however, that the farmers are not going to get now, from this administration, what they want, what they are demanding, and what they are entitled to. I think we have all realized that for some time past. Great and powerful interests in America are determined that nothing is to be done for the farmer's relief which might perchance prejudiciously affect or interfere with their interests or purposes or in any way militate against the opportunities they now enjoy in the exploitation of the farmer. That is the reason farmer's relief legislation is granted, if at all, so grudgingly and with such measured circumspection.

Mr. STANFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. STANFIELD. Do I understand that it is the opinion of the Senator that the legislation that is pending here is for the purpose of deceiving the farmer, or that it is being influenced by interests adverse to him?

Mr. SIMMONS. What I said, and what I meant to say, is that if we should enact the particular provision to which I was referring—not the whole act but the particular provision to which I was referring, namely, the one that authorizes loans upon agriculture in the Capper bill—it would be a pretense, because it would not accomplish its purpose; that the farmer in some instances would be led to expect that he would get what he would not get, and therefore it is a fraud.

Mr. STANFIELD. I should like further to ask the Senator if he does not think that either legislators or interests that are attempting to deceive the farmer in that way are standing in their own light?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do, and they will eventually discover the fact. All I have said about that, and all I care to say about that, is that I know, and everybody in this Chamber knows, that such financial legislation in the interest of the farmers as we have sought to enact here, beginning with the creation of the War Finance Corporation, has been met with opposition from the great dominating financial interests of the country, and that in that opposition they have more often than otherwise had the sympathetic cooperation of the Treasury Department.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. We all know that before the late election we were unable to pass adequate farmers' legislation because of the unsympathetic attitude of the administration, reflected in the attitude of the majority party in this body.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Just a minute, if the Senator please. But we had an election——

Mr. McLEAN. I wish the Senator would yield right there.

Mr. SIMMONS. Not yet. And in that election the electorate of this country made it clear that the American farmers are aroused upon the question of the neglect of the Congress to take appropriate action to meet their needs and demands in this behalf, and they registered their protest in the results of the November election. It was the result of that election which brought the Republican administration to a realization of the wisdom of giving heed to these demands and to hurriedly summon the leaders of that party to a conference to consider ways and means to placate and satisfy these outraged sons of toil, with the result that the Republican press for weeks was filled with assurances that the one consuming desire of the administration was to take care of the poor, oppressed farmer.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that if there was any opposition to the revival of the War Finance Corporation it was when a Democrat was Secretary of the Treasury, and that the bill itself passed the Senate, if my recollection is correct, without a roll call. There was no opposition whatever to it in the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the opposition of the moneyed interests of this country was against this legislation under Wilson as it has been under Harding, and that in that particular they were simply reflecting the position of the financial interests of the country.

Mr. McLEAN. It seems the moneyed interests of the country had no influence whatever upon the Senate. The record shows that. It passed without a roll call.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, we did pass it, but the Senator knows that the first War Finance Corporation act was treated as a war measure, and open opposition silenced. It was after the war that the opposition of the interests was manifested when it was sought to continue and enlarge the powers conferred during the war to meet the emergencies of actual war. These enactments restoring or continuing and enlarging the war powers of this corporation met with opposition from the financial interests, just as the present movement for agricultural relief is meeting with vigorous opposition from the financial interests.

Mr. McLEAN. I know the Senator does not want to speak without authority, or to make a misstatement with regard to this. The American Bankers' Association passed a resolution in favor of this bill. I do not know of a bank in the country that is opposed to it. They are all in favor of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, certainly; but this bill does not give the farmer real or adequate relief. I have already shown, so far as relieving the real need of the farmer is concerned, it is a fake and pretense, and I insist—I am simply stating the fact—that the the big financial interests are still fighting any effort which would give adequate relief to agriculture and which would in any great degree prevent those interests from continuing their exploitation of the farmers. I am not speaking of the average banker but the big dominating groups of the great cities.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator is speaking of the moneyed interests in this country opposing this legislation, and I want to call his attention to the fact that the American Bankers' Association passed resolutions in favor of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. That may be, and that fact, may I again remind the Senator, may find its explanation in the pending bill itself—that it furnishes the farmer no real or adequate relief.

Anyway, I will say to the Senator, I am not talking about the country banks or the banks of the relatively small cities; I am talking about the great banking groups of the big financial centers, which hold the purse strings of the Nation. There can be no question that we have had trouble about this legislation by reason of their persistent opposition. Of course, I am not charging any Senator or any committee with consciously yielding to it. But I am stating a fact well known to anyone who is familiar with the history of legislation of this character during the past few years.

I see that we are not going to get adequate legislation now. I am sure about that. We are going to pass the Capper bill and the Lenroot bill. They do not deal adequately with the situation. The farmers do not believe they deal adequately with the situation. The Norbeck bill probably does; at least, to a much greater extent. The bill I introduced possibly does; I do not say it does. But the latter two bills have had no consideration up to this time. I shall not press my bill, because I know the disadvantages a bill originating upon this side of the Chamber has in this body. But the Norbeck bill is largely a counterpart of mine. It deals with the same proposition, in some respects probably more effectively than mine does. I suppose it will be pressed, but it will not pass, because it goes too far in accomplishing the result of liberating agriculture from the other interests; because it gives to agriculture a full measure of relief, to attain financial freedom; because it puts the farmer, in the matter of financing his business and his operations in production, in marketing, in distribution, in the same independent position as that occupied by the financial interests and the commercial interests of the United States.

Mr. President, the reason we have in this country to-day an unbalanced condition of prosperity, the commercial interests and the manufacturing interests and the banking interests rolling in prosperity, while the agricultural interests, the farmers, are wallowing in the slough of despond and depression, is largely due to the fact that the one class is amply financed and able to protect itself, while the other class is unfinanced and unable to protect itself. For this reason the farmer is not an independent man. He is a commercial slave. He is the victim of everybody who wants to exploit him. He must sacrifice the products of his labor and the sweat of his brow at whatever price this more fortunate class are willing to pay. That is one of the chief reasons for this unbalanced condition of prosperity we see in this country to-day—high prices on the one side, low prices on the other side; overflowing prosperity on one side, and poverty, want, and distress on the other side.

Those of us who are here asking for financial legislation in the interest of the farmer want legislation that will make him as independent a man financially as the people with whom he has to deal in his business relations, and I say to the Senator from Connecticut that until the American farmers are put in that position they will continue to be drawers of water and hewers of wood for the balance of the population.

We will not get the needed agricultural relief legislation through at this time. We must again appeal to the electorate.

It seems that the lesson of last November was not quite sufficient. Mr. President, I warn Senators that the farming interests of the United States have been and are thoroughly aroused to the conditions of discrimination which exist, of the disadvantages under which they labor, of the persistent refusal to give them the relief they need, and in the next election, if I am not the worst mistaken man upon the face of the earth, the farmers of this country, before they cast their votes for any man to represent them in the Congress of the United States, are going to know his attitude toward adequate and full and equal financial opportunities for agriculture through the instrumentalities of the Government.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading clerk resumed the reading of the bill at page 19, line 3, and read as follows:

LICENSED INSPECTORS OF LIVE STOCK.

SEC. 11. That the Secretary of Agriculture may issue a license to any person, upon presentation to him of satisfactory evidence that such person is competent, to inspect live stock as a basis for loans. The Secretary of Agriculture may suspend or revoke any license issued by him under this act whenever, after opportunity for hearing has been given to the licensee, the Secretary shall determine that such licensee is incompetent, or has knowingly or carelessly made false or erroneous inspection reports with respect to any live stock, or has accepted any money or other consideration, directly or indirectly, for any neglect or improper performance of duty, or has in any other manner shown himself to be unfit to act as a live-stock inspector. Pending investigation the Secretary of Agriculture, whenever he deems it necessary, may suspend a license temporarily without a hearing. It shall be unlawful for any person other than a holder of a license duly issued under this section, or any person whose license has been suspended or revoked under the terms of this section, to represent that he is a Federally licensed live-stock inspector, and any violation of this provision shall be punishable by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or both.

Any inspector licensed under the provisions of this section who makes any statement in any inspection report or to any person for the purpose of obtaining for himself or any other person any advance on the security of the live stock inspected, knowing the same to be false, or who willfully overvalues any security by which an advance is secured, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

The Comptroller of the Currency shall allot to the Department of Agriculture from time to time such sums as may be estimated to be necessary for the administration of this section, and may ratably assess the same from time to time against the corporations organized under this act.

NATIONAL BANKS MAY BECOME STOCKHOLDERS.

SEC. 12. That any national banking association may file application with the Comptroller of the Currency for permission to invest an amount not exceeding in the aggregate 10 per cent of its paid-in capital stock and surplus in the stock of one or more of the corporations organized under the provisions of this act, and upon approval of such application may purchase such stock. The Comptroller of the Currency shall have discretion to approve or reject such application in whole or in part.

TAXATION.

SEC. 14. That the moneys of corporations organized under the provisions of this act may be kept on deposit subject to check in any of the Federal reserve banks.

The Federal reserve banks are hereby authorized to act as depositories for and fiscal agents of any of the corporations organized under the provisions of this act in the general performance of the powers conferred by this title.

USE OF WORDS "FEDERAL AGRICULTURAL CREDIT" IN CORPORATE TITLE.

SEC. 15. That all corporations not organized under the provisions of this act are prohibited from using the words "Federal agricultural credit" as a part of their corporate name, and any violation of this prohibition committed after the passage of this act shall subject the party charged therewith with a penalty of $50 for each day during which it is committed or repeated.

CONVERSION OF STATE FINANCING CORPORATIONS INTO RURAL CREDIT CORPORATIONS.

SEC. 16. That any agricultural or live stock financing corporation incorporated by special law of any State or organized under the general laws of any State and having an unimpaired capital sufficient to entitle it to become a Federal agricultural credit corporation under the provisions of this act, may, by the vote of the shareholders owning not less than 51 per cent of the capital stock of such corporation, with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, be converted into a Federal agricultural credit corporation under this act, with any name approved by the Comptroller of the Currency: Provided, however, That the said conversion shall not be in contravention of the State law. In such case the articles of association and organization certificate may be executed by a majority of the directors of the corporation, and the certificate shall declare that the owners of 51 per cent of the capital stock have authorized the directors to make such certificate and to change or convert the corporation into a Federal agricultural credit corporation under this act. A majority of the directors, after executing the articles of association and the organization certificate, shall have power to execute all other papers and to do whatever may be required to make its organization perfect and complete as a Federal agricultural credit corporation. The shares of any such corporation may continue to be for the same amount each as they were before the conversion, and the directors may continue to be directors of the corporation until others are elected or appointed. When the comptroller has given to such corporation a certificate that the provisions of this act have been complied with, such corporation, and all its stockholders, officers, and employees, shall have the same powers and privileges and shall be subject to the same duties, liabilities, and regulations, in all respects, as shall have been prescribed by this act for corporations originally organized as Federal agricultural credit corporations.

CONSOLIDATION OF CORPORATIONS ORGANIZED UNDER THIS ACT.

SEC. 17. That any two or more corporations organized under the provisions of this act, with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, may consolidate into one corporation under the charter of either or any of the existing corporations on such terms and conditions as may be lawfully agreed upon by a majority of the board of directors of each corporation proposing to consolidate, such agreement to be ratified and confirmed by the affirmative vote of the shareholders of each of such corporations owning at least two-thirds of its capital stock outstanding, at a meeting to be held on the call of the directors after publishing notice of the time, place, and object of the meeting for four consecutive weeks in some newspaper published in the place where the said corporation is located, and if no newspaper is published in the place then in a paper published nearest thereto, and after sending such notice to each shareholder of record by registered mail at least 10 days prior to said meeting: Provided, however, That the capital stock of such consolidated corporation shall not be less than $250,000 paid in if the corporations consolidated are organized to exercise the powers covered by section 4, and provided that the capital stock of such consolidated corporation shall not be less than $1,000,000 paid in if the corporations consolidated are those organized under section 8: And provided further, That when such consolidation shall have been effected and approved by the comptroller any shareholder of either of the corporations so consolidated who has not voted for such consolidation may give notice to the directors of the corporation in which he is interested, within 20 days from the date of the certificate of approval of the comptroller, that he dissents from the plan of consolidation as adopted and approved, whereupon he shall be entitled to receive the value of the shares so held by him, to be ascertained by an appraisal made by a committee of three persons, one to be selected by the shareholder, one by the directors, and the third by the two so chosen; and in case the value so affixed shall not be satisfactory to the shareholder, he may, within five days after being notified of the appraisal, appeal to the Comptroller of the Currency, who shall cause a reappraisal to be made, which shall be final and binding; and if said reappraisal shall exceed the value affixed by said committee the corporation shall pay the expense of the reappraisal, otherwise the appellant shall pay said expense; and the value so ascertained and determined shall be deemed to be a debt due and be forthwith paid to said shareholder by said corporation, and the shares so paid shall be surrendered and after due notice sold at public auction within 30 days after the final appraisement provided for by this act.

Where corporations consolidate under the provisions of this act, all of the rights, franchises, and interest of said corporations shall be consolidated in and to every species of property, personal and mixed, and choses in action thereto belonging, and shall be deemed to be transferred to and vested in the corporation into which it is consolidated without any deed or other transfer, and the said consolidated corporation shall hold and enjoy the same and all rights of property, franchises, and interest, in the same manner and to the same extent as they were held and enjoyed by the corporations so consolidated therewith.

INSOLVENCY, RECEIVERSHIP, AND LIQUIDATION.

SEC. 18. That whenever any corporation organized under the provisions of this act shall be dissolved and its rights, privileges, and franchises declared forfeited as prescribed in the preceding section, or whenever any creditor of any such corporation shall have obtained a judgment against it in any court of record and made application accompanied by a certificate from the clerk of the court, stating that such judgment has been rendered and has remained unpaid for the space of 30 days or whenever the comptroller shall become satisfied of the insolvency of such corporation, he may, after due examination of its affairs in either case, appoint a receiver who shall proceed to wind up the affairs of such corporation. The receiver so appointed shall exercise the powers and be subject to the restrictions of receivers of national banks; and the comptroller shall have the same powers and duties in connection with the administration of such receivership as he has in reference to the receivership of national banks.

Shareholders' agents for shareholders of corporations organized under the provisions of this act may be appointed in the manner prescribed by section 522 of the national bank act, being the act of June 30, 1876, as amended, and shall have the same general powers and duties and be subject to the same restrictions as shoreholders' agents of a national bank.

Any corporation organized under the provisions of this act may go into liquidation and be closed by the vote of its shareholders owning two-thirds of its stock. Whenever a vote is taken to go into liquidation it shall be the duty of the board of directors to cause notice of this fact to be certified under the seal of the corporation by its president or cashier to the Comptroller of the Currency and publication thereof to be made for a period of two months in a newspaper published in the city or town in which the corporation is located, or if no newspaper is there published, in the newspaper published nearest thereto, that the corporation is closing up its affairs and notifying its creditors to present their claims against the corporation for payment. All such claims shall be presented to and approved by a liquidating agent to be appointed by the board of directors of such corporation, with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, and the affairs of such corporation shall be liquidated by such agent and under the supervision of the Comptroller of the Currency.

PENALTY FOR VIOLATION OF THE PROVISIONS OF THIS ACT.

SEC. 19. That if the directors of any corporation organized under the provisions of this act shall knowingly violate or knowingly permit any of the officers, agents, or servants of the corporation to violate any of the provisions of this act, all the rights, privileges, and franchises of the corporation shall be thereby forfeited. Such violation shall, however, be determined and adjudged by a district court of the United States in a suit brought for that purpose by the Comptroller of the Currency in his own name before the corporation shall be declared dissolved, and in cases of such violation every director who participated or assented to the same shall be held liable in his personal and individual capacity for all damages which the corporation, its shareholders, or any other person shall have sustained in consequence of such violation.

PENALTY FOR EMBEZZLEMENT, FORGERY, FALSE STATEMENTS, ETC.

SEC. 20. That any officer, director, agent, or employee of any corporation organized under the provisions of this act who embezzles, abstracts, or willfully misapplies any of the moneys, funds, or credits of such corporation, or who, without authority from the directors, draws any order or bill of exchange, makes any acceptance, issues, puts forth, or assigns any note, debenture, bond, draft, bill of exchange, mortgage, judgment, or decree, or who makes any false entry in any book, report, or statement of such corporation with intent in any case to injure or defraud such corporation or any other company or person, or to deceive any officer of such corporation or the Comptroller of the Currency, or any agent or examiner appointed to examine the affairs of such corporation; and every receiver of such corporation who, with like intent to defraud or injure, embezzles, abstracts, purloins, or willfully misapplies any of the moneys, funds, or assets of the corporation, and every person who with like intent aids or abets any officer, director, agent, employee, or receiver in any violation of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof in any district court of the United States shall be fined not more than $5,000 or shall be imprisoned for not more than five years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

Whoever (1) makes any statement, knowing it to be false, for the purpose of obtaining for himself or for any other person, firm, corporation, or association any advance, or extension or renewal of an advance, or any release or substitution of security, from a corporation organized under the provisions of this act, or for the purpose of influencing in any other way the action of such corporation, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

Whoever willfully overvalues any security by which any such advance is secured shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

Whoever (1) falsely makes, forges, or counterfeits any debenture, bond, coupon, or other obligation of any corporation organized under the provisions of this act, in imitation of or purporting to be in imitation of any such obligation issued by any such corporation; or (2) passes, utters, or publishes, or attempts to pass, utter, or publish, any false, forged, or counterfeited bond, debenture, coupon, or other obligation purporting to be issued by any such corporation, knowing the same to be falsely made, forged, or counterfeited; or (3) falsely alters any such bond, debenture, coupon, or other obligation; or (4) passes, utters, or publishes as true any falsely altered or spurious bond, debenture, coupon, or other obligation, issued or purported to have been issued by any such corporation, knowing the same to be falsely altered or spurious, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

Whoever being an officer, director, employee, agent, or attorney of a corporation organized under the provisions of this act stipulates for or receives or consents or agrees to receive any fee, commission, gift, or thing of value from any person, firm, or corporation for procuring or endeavoring to procure for such person, firm, or corporation, or for any other person, firm, or corporation any loan from any such corporation or extension or renewal of loan or substitution of security, or the purchase or discount or acceptance of any paper, note, draft, check, or bill of exchange by any such corporation, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be imprisoned for not more than one year and fined not more than $5,000, or both.

SEC. 21. That the right to amend, alter, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). The Secretary will state the amendment reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency at the top of page 32.

The READING CLERK. At the top of page 32 it is proposed to insert:

TITLE II.

AMENDMENTS TO FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

SEC. 201. That paragraph 1 of section 7 of the Federal reserve act be amended by striking out all of said paragraph and substituting the following:

"After all necessary expenses of a Federal reserve bank have been paid or provided for the stockholders shall be entitled to receive an annual dividend of 6 per cent on the paid-in capital stock, which dividend shall be cumulative and may be paid out of any surplus in excess of 100 per cent of subscribed capital. Out of any net earnings remaining after the aforesaid dividend and surplus claims have been fully met there shall be paid each year to the United States as a franchise tax such an amount as will make the aggregate amount so paid for the year 1922 and subsequent years equal to the aggregate amount of the cumulative dividends paid to the stockholding member banks for such years. After the full amount of the franchise tax shall have been paid to the United States the balance of the net earnings of any year shall be paid into a surplus fund until it shall amount to 100 per cent of subscribed capital, and thereafter when net earnings exceed 12 per cent an extra dividend of not to exceed 3 per cent may be distributed to the stockholders and the remaining net earnings, if any, shall be paid to the United States as an additional franchise tax."

Mr. McLEAN. When that section was framed by the committee we supposed that all of the Federal reserve banks had accumulated a 100 per cent surplus, but we find that the bank at Dallas, Tex., has not accumulated such a surplus. It will, therefore, be necessary to make a slight modification of the amendment, which I shall now propose. Beginning on line 9, page 32, I move to strike out the words "and may be paid out of any surplus in excess of 100 per cent of subscribed capital."

Mr. FLETCHER. That, as I understand, would strike out the remainder of the sentence after the word "cumulative"?

Mr. McLEAN. I have another amendment to offer if the one I have offered shall be adopted, I will say to the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. McLEAN. On page 32, line 12, after the word "dividend," I move to strike out the words "and surplus," so that it will read:

Out of any net earnings remaining after the aforesaid dividend claims have been fully met—

And so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. McLEAN. At the bottom of page 32, I move to strike out lines 24 and 25 and to insert in lieu thereof the amendment to the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut to the committee amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. At the bottom of page 32 it is proposed to strike out lines 24 and 25, as follows: "And the remaining net earnings, if any, shall be paid to the United States as an additional franchise tax"; and in lieu thereof to insert: "And 10 per cent of the remaining net earnings shall be paid into the surplus, and 90 per cent shall be paid to the United States as an additional franchise tax."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to suggest to the chairman of the committee that on page 32, line 22, after the word "earnings," there should be inserted the words "in any year"; so that it will read:

And thereafter when net earnings in any year exceed 12 per cent—

And so forth.

Mr. McLEAN. I shall be glad to accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Florida to the committee amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 32, line 22, after the word "earnings," it is proposed to insert "in any year"; so that it will read:

And thereafter when net earnings in any year exceed 12 per cent.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Banking and Currency was, at the top of page 33, to strike out section 201, as follows:

SEC. 201. That section 13 of the Federal reserve act, as amended, be further amended by striking out the proviso at the end of the second paragraph of said section, so that said paragraph shall read as follows:

"Upon the indorsement of any of its member banks, which shall be deemed a waiver of demand, notice, and protest by such bank as to its own indorsement exclusively, any Federal reserve bank may discount notes, drafts, and bills of exchange arising out of actual commercial transactions; that is, notes, drafts, and bills of exchange issued or drawn for agricultural, industrial, or commercial purposes, or the proceeds of which have been used, or are to be used, for such purposes, the Federal Reserve Board to have the right to determine or define the character of the paper thus eligible for discount, within the meaning of this act. Nothing in this act contained shall be construed to prohibit such notes, drafts, and bills of exchange, secured by staple agricultural products or other goods, wares, or merchandise from being eligible for such discount, but such definition shall not include notes, drafts, or bills covering merely investments or issued or drawn for the purpose of carrying or trading in stocks, bonds, or other investment securities, except bonds and notes of the Government of the United States. Notes, drafts, and bills admitted to discount under the terms of this paragraph must have a maturity at the time of discount of not more than 90 days, exclusive of days of grace."

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 202. That section 13 of the Federal reserve act, as amended, be further amended by striking out the proviso at the end of the second paragraph of said section and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Upon the indorsement of any of its member banks, which shall be deemed a waiver of demand, notice, and protest by such bank as to its own indorsement exclusively, and subject to regulations and limitations to be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board, any Federal reserve bank may discount or purchase bills of exchange payable at sight or on demand which are drawn to finance the domestic shipment of nonperishable, readily marketable staple agricultural products and are secured by bills of lading or other shipping documents conveying or securing title to such staples: Provided, however, That all such bills of exchange shall be forwarded promptly for collection, and demand for payment shall be made with reasonable promptness after the arrival of such staples at their destination: Provided further, That no such bill shall in any event be held by or for the account of a Federal reserve bank for a period in excess of 90 days. In discounting such bills Federal reserve banks may compute the interest to be deducted on the basis of the estimated life of each bill and adjust the discount after payment of such bills to conform to the actual life thereof."

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask the chairman of the committee has he any amendments to offer to that amendment?

Mr. McLEAN. No.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then I suggest, on page 34, line 9, after the words "Federal Reserve Board," to insert the words "not inconsistent with law," so that the sentence would read:

and subject to regulations and limitations to be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board not inconsistent with law.

I assume such regulations and limitations will not be inconsistent with law, but I rather think we ought not to permit them to legislate.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not think the amendment is necessary, but I have no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. On page 34, line 14, after the word "documents," I move to insert the words "attached thereto," so that the language would read:

and are secured by bills of lading or other shipping documents attached thereto.

It seems to me such documents should be attached to the paper which is being discounted.

Mr. McLEAN. It would be natural to assume that such documents would accompany the paper.

Mr. FLETCHER. I know they accompany the paper, but it seems to me that the bill of lading or other shipping documents should be attached to such paper.

Mr. McLEAN. I see no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then, on page 34, in line 23, I suggest to the chairman of the committee that the word "discount" might be improved on, and I propose that we strike out the word "discount" and insert the words "amount thus deducted," so that it would read:

In discounting such bills Federal reserve banks may compute the interest to be deducted on the basis of the estimated life of each bill and adjust the amount thus deducted after the payment of such bills to conform to the actual life thereof.

Mr. McLEAN. I see no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Banking and Currency was, on page 34, line 25, to change the number of the section from 202 to 203.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 13, page 35, as follows:

SEC. 203. That the Federal reserve act, as amended, be further amended by striking out the fourth paragraph of section 13 thereof and inserting in lieu of said fourth paragraph the following:

"Any Federal reserve bank may discount acceptances of the kinds hereinafter described, which have a maturity at the time of discount of not more than 90 days sight, exclusive of days of grace, and which are indorsed by at least one member bank: Provided, That such acceptances if drawn for an agricultural purpose and secured at the time of acceptance by warehouse receipts or other such document conveying or securing title covering readily marketable staples may be discounted with a maturity at the time of discount of not more than six months sight, exclusive of days of grace."

The next amendment of the Committee on Banking and Currency was, on page 35, line 14, to change the number of the section from 203 to 204.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, at this point I have an amendment which I wish to offer. Is the bill being read merely for committee amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been agreed that committee amendments shall first be considered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well. There will be no objection, then, to my offering my amendment later on?

Mr. McLEAN. No.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Banking and Currency was, on page 36, line 1, before the word "months," to strike out "six" and insert "nine"; and in the same line, after the word "months," to strike out: "Provided, however, That (a) such notes, drafts, or bills of exchange, when secured by warehouse receipts or other such negotiable documents, conveying or securing title to readily marketable, nonperishable agricultural products, may be discounted with a maturity, at the time of discount, not exceeding nine months, under regulations to be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board. Such regulations shall be designed to insure that such notes, drafts, or bills of exchange were drawn or issued as a part of a program of orderly marketing of such agricultural products, and not for speculative holding of such products. (b) Such notes, drafts, or bills of exchange, when secured by chattel mortgage upon live stock, may be discounted with a maturity not exceeding nine months, provided such live stock is at the time of discount being fattened for market, under such conditions that it will be ready for market on or before the date of maturity of such note, draft, or bill. Notes, drafts, or bills of exchange secured by chattel mortgage upon breeding herds shall not be eligible for rediscount under this section." And insert: "Provided, however, That notes, drafts, and bills of exchange with maturities in excess of six months shall not be eligible as a basis for the issuance of Federal reserve notes unless secured by warehouse receipts or other such negotiable documents conveying or securing title to readily marketable staple agricultural products or by chattel mortgage upon live stock which is being fattened for market." So as to make the section read:

SEC. 204. That the Federal reserve act, as amended, be further amended by adding at the end of section 13 a new section, to be numbered section 13a, and to read as follows:

"DISCOUNT OF AGRICULTURAL AND LIVE-STOCK PAPER.

"SEC. 13a. Upon the indorsement of any of its member banks, which shall be deemed a waiver of demand, notice, and protest by such bank as to its own indorsement exclusively, any Federal reserve bank may discount notes, drafts, and bills of exchange issued or drawn for an agricultural purpose, or based upon live stock, and having a maturity, at the time of discount, exclusive of days of grace, not exceeding nine months: Provided, however, That notes, drafts, and bills of exchange with maturities in excess of six months shall not be eligible as a basis for the issuance of Federal reserve notes unless secured by warehouse receipts or other such negotiable documents conveying or securing title to readily marketable staple agricultural products or by chattel mortgage upon live stock which is being fattened for market."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if he does not think the language following the word "notes," on line 22, ought to be stricken out of the amendment? If we retain in the bill the words "unless secured by warehouse receipts or other such negotiable documents conveying or securing title to readily marketable staple agricultural products or by chattel mortgage upon live stock which is being fattened for market" would they refer back to the nine months' provision in the act, or would they leave the door wide open for paper thus secured to be made the basis of circulating notes, no matter when the maturity was?

I understand the effect of the provision is that "notes, drafts, and bills of exchange issued or drawn for an agricultural purpose or based upon live stock having a maturity at the time of discount, exclusive of days of grace not exceeding nine months," shall be eligible for rediscount, but in order to be eligible as a basis for circulating notes the time of maturity must be six months, unless there is a warehouse receipt or a mortgage or a transfer of title accompanying the note. In that case are they eligible as a basis for circulating notes, no matter when the time of maturity is fixed, or is there a nine months' maturity?

Mr. McLEAN. There is a nine months' maturity if they are secured, and if they are not secured they are limited to six months. I should be very glad to accept an amendment striking out all after the word "notes," because I do not think that any paper of more than six months' maturity should be used as collateral for the issuance of notes payable in gold on demand; but I had to subordinate my views to the views of the majority of the committee. I myself think it is an unwise extension, but it is clear enough what the provision means.

Mr. FLETCHER. I thought I would draw attention to that matter.

Mr. McLEAN. I want to say to the Senator that there was not a witness who appeared before the Commission of Agricultural Inquiry who recommended an extension longer than six months in any instance, whether secured or not. The committee decided to extend the time to nine months, but the committee put in the limitation that it should not be used for collateral for Federal reserve notes unless it was secured if the maturity was more than six months.

Mr. FLETCHER. And then, if thus secured, the maturity must be within nine months?

Mr. McLEAN. That is right.

Mr. FLETCHER. I shall not offer an amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I want to say just a word about the suggestion of the Senator from Florida. Nine months is very much better than six, but nine months is not long enough for some of the business of the farmers. We are running right into the commercial idea of banking. The Senator from Connecticut does not think that any of these loans should be extended over six months.

Mr. McLEAN. No; the Senator from Alabama is entirely mistaken.

Mr. HEFLIN. What was the Senator's position?

Mr. McLEAN. I do not object to the extension of the time from six months to nine months so far as the rediscount feature is concerned. My objection pertains to the right to use these notes as collateral for the issuance of Federal reserve notes; that is all. I do not object to the extension to nine months on the agricultural paper.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, nine months is not long enough. We have quite a hard time getting certain Members of the House, when we passed the Federal reserve act, to go up from three months to six months.

Now, we are having just as hard a time to get from 6 months up to 9 months, and the time will come when we will go to 12 months. We may not do it now, but the farmer needs 12 months' time. Whenever you fix it for a shorter time the danger is that they can take advantage of the farmer and the farmer's condition and force him to dispose of his stuff, and perhaps to do it on a dead market. That is not true with other collateral. In any other kind of commercial transaction you can go to a bank and keep on renewing your note and keep on getting an extension of time; but we have metes and bounds about the farmer, and restraints and restrictions, until he is forced right up against a hard proposition, and frequently is forced to sacrifice his property and suffer heavy losses. When he wants an extension of time, and wants to be aided so that he can hold his stuff off the market until the price will yield a profit, certain agencies are working not to aid him but to force him to dispose of his stuff, and he has to do it at a sacrifice. That is why the farmers of America are in such desperate straits to-day.

If this bill will not do the work, let us amend it so that it will. Of course, I am very much better pleased with the nine months' time than I was with the six months. This will be of considerable help, but for some farm transactions it is not long enough. I want to fix it so that the farmer will be the master of his business, just as people in the commercial world with other kinds of collateral are the masters of their business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and the reading clerk read as follows:

Notes, drafts, or bills of exchange issued or drawn by cooperative marketing associations composed of producers of agricultural products shall be deemed to have been issued or drawn for an agricultural purpose within the meaning of this section if the proceeds thereof have been or are to be advanced by such association to any members thereof for an agricultural purpose, or have been or are to be used by such association in making payments to any members thereof on account of agricultural products delivered by such members to the association, or if such proceeds have been or are to be used by such association to meet expenditures incurred or to be incurred by the association in connection with the grading, processing, packing, preparation for market, or marketing of any agricultural product handled by such association for any of its members: Provided, however, That the express enumeration in this paragraph of certain classes of paper of cooperative marketing associations as eligible for rediscount shall not be construed as rendering ineligible any other class of paper of such associations which is now eligible for rediscount.

The Federal Reserve Board may, by regulation, limit to a percentage of the assets of a Federal reserve bank the amount of notes, drafts, acceptances, or bills having a maturity in excess of three months, but not exceeding six months, exclusive of days of grace, which may be discounted by such bank, and the amount of notes, drafts, or bills, or acceptances having a maturity in excess of six months but not exceeding nine months which may be discounted by such bank.

The next amendment was, on page 38, line 7, to change the number of the section from "204" to "205," and on line 12 to strike out "upon" and insert "under," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 205. That the Federal reserve act, as amended, be further amended by adding at the end of section 14 a new paragraph, as follows:

"(f) To purchase and sell in the open market, either from or to domestic banks, firms, corporations, or individuals, acceptances of corporations organized under the Federal agricultural credits act whenever the Federal Reserve Board shall declare that the public interest so requires."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, line 15, to change the number of the section from "205" to "206," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 206. That the Federal reserve act, as amended, be further amended by striking out the ninth paragraph of section 9 of said act and substituting in lieu thereof the following:

"No applying bank shall be admitted to membership in a Federal reserve bank unless it possesses a paid-up, unimpaired capital sufficient to entitle it to become a national banking association in the place where it is situated under the provisions of the national bank act: Provided, however, That an applying bank organized in a place the population of which does not exceed 6,000 inhabitants may, in the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board, be admitted to membership if it possesses a paid-up, unimpaired capital of at least $30,000, and if the application is accompanied by adequate undertakings of such bank and of its principal stockholders that the capital of such bank will within three years be increased to $50,000: And provided further, That an applying bank, organized in a place the population of which does not exceed 3,000 inhabitants, may, in the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board, be admitted to membership if it possesses a paid-up, unimpaired capital of at least $15,000, and if it is accompanied by adequate undertakings of such bank and of its principal stockholders that such capital will within three years be increased to $25,000. If any such undertakings have not been fulfilled within three years the Federal Reserve Board may forbid such bank to enjoy any of the privileges of this act, and may require it to withdraw forthwith from membership in the Federal reserve system."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and the reading clerk read as follows:

TITLE III.

AMENDMENTS TO WAR FINANCE CORPORATION ACT.

SEC. 301. That the time during which the War Finance Corporation may make advances and purchase notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or other securities under the terms of sections 21, 22, 23, and 24 of the War Finance Corporation act, as amended, is further extended up to and including February 29, 1924: Provided, That if any application for an advance or for the purchase by the War Finance Corporation of notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or other securities is received at the office of the corporation in the District of Columbia on or before February 29, 1924, such application may be acted upon and approved, and the advance may be made or the notes, drafts, or other securities purchased at any time prior to March 31, 1924.

SEC. 302. That the second paragraph of section 12 of Title I of the War Finance Corporation act, as amended, is further amended to read as follows:

"The power of the corporation to issue notes or bonds may be exercised at any time prior to January 31, 1927, but no such bonds or notes shall mature later than June 30, 1927."

SEC. 303. (a) That paragraph 3 of section 15 of Title I of such act, as amended, is amended by striking out at the beginning of such paragraph the words "beginning July 1, 1923," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "beginning April 1, 1924."

(b) Paragraph 4 of such section, as amended, is amended by striking out at the beginning of such paragraph the words "After July 1, 1923," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "After April 1, 1924."

TITLE IV.

AMENDMENT TO FEDERAL FARM LOAN ACT.

SEC. 401. That paragraph 7 of section 12 of the Federal farm loan act be amended to read as follows:

"Seventh. The amount of loans to any one borrower shall in no case exceed a maximum of $25,000, nor shall any one loan be for a less sum than $100."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I had offered and had printed an amendment in reference to factors' paper, and suggested that it ought to come in on page 35. After consultation with the chairman of the committee, I have concluded to withdraw that amendment to this bill and offer it to the Lenroot bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment on page 40, following line 8, as a new section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 40, after line 8, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. —. That the War Finance Corporation act, approved April 5, 1918, as amended, is amended further by adding, after section 28 of Title I thereof, a new section to read as follows:

"SEC. —. That the corporation is hereby authorized and empowered—

"(a) To purchase, without recourse against the drawer thereof, and upon such other terms not inconsistent with this act as it may determine, from any person of the United States producing or dealing in foodstuffs or wool or cotton, or any articles manufactured therefrom in the United States, drafts or bills of exchange secured by bills of lading or other instruments in writing conveying or securing merchantable title to said foodstuffs or wool or cotton or any articles manufactured therefrom in the United States when such drafts or bills of exchange are drawn against sales of said foodstuffs, products, or manufactured articles by any such person to a foreign buyer or buyers established and doing business in foreign countries to be secured by proper and sufficient collateral or by the guaranty of a legally established foreign government, or by both such collateral and guaranty as may be deemed advisable in the judgment and discretion of the directors of the War Finance Corporation. No such drafts or bills of exchange or conveyance of title shall have a maturity of more than six months from the time of purchase: Provided, That in the discretion of the directors of the War Finance Corporation such maturity may be fixed not to exceed nine months.

"(b) To purchase, without recourse against the drawer or indorser thereof, and upon such other items not inconsistent with this act as it may determine, from any bank, banker, or trust company of the United States, drafts or bills of exchange or conveyance of title, secured by proper and sufficient collateral or by the guaranty of a legally established foreign government, or by both such collateral and guaranty in the manner described in paragraph (a) of this section, when said bank, banker, or trust company has purchased and guaranteed drafts or bills of exchange from a person of the United States producing or dealing in foodstuffs, or wool or cotton, or any articles manufactured therefrom in the United States, without recourse against such person.

"The said corporation shall provide for the registration with it of all contracts, bills of exchange, or conveyances of title entered into between said sellers of the United States and those foreign buyers whose purchase contracts and drafts and conveyances of title have collateral or guaranties as provided herein. Purchases of drafts or bills of exchange or conveyances of title may be made under this section at any time prior to February 29, 1924. The aggregate amount of such purchases authorized under the provisions of this section of the act shall not at any time exceed $250,000,000: Provided, That in no case shall any of the money so advanced under this section be expended without the United States.

"(c) That any provisions of the War Finance Corporation act, as amended, inconsistent with section 29 herein provided are hereby repealed."

The word "person" when used in this section shall be construed to mean an individual citizen of the United States, a partnership composed of such citizens, a corporation organized under the laws of the United States or one of the component States thereof, or an association composed of such citizens, partnerships or corporations.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the so-called Capper bill, which is now being considered, carries with it at least two propositions that in my opinion are very splendid. One is the amendment to the Federal reserve act extending the time for the discount or rediscount of agricultural paper from six months to nine months. The other is the extension of the life of the War Finance Corporation another year.

The amendment that I have offered applies to the War Finance Corporation and would operate during the life of the War Finance Corporation. In a sentence, it provides that the War Finance Corporation can make loans to interests here and abroad where they are purchasing agricultural products in this country, such as corn, wheat, cotton, or wool, or products made from cotton and wool, and where they can give good and sufficient security. You will note the money must be expended here and the collateral must be adequate and good.

Mr. President, this amendment I have offered is the same as the measure known as the Norbeck bill, with a slight change. A similar bill was introduced in the House. The agricultural interests of the country believed that the enactment of such a measure would greatly help them in their present distressed condition. One of the main troubles with agriculture to-day is a lack of markets abroad and a lack of credit in those markets. There are interests abroad which have the collateral with which to purchase these crops, be they wheat or cotton or what not, provided they could get the money, and the War Finance Corporation could easily loan the money. The limitation here is up to $250,000,000. There would be no more risk involved than has been involved in advancing the money in this country under the amendment to the War Finance Corporation act and under the original act. But it does offer an opportunity for the farmers of the country to sell their surplus crops for export and will greatly aid in helping them to get increased prices for their products.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I have not had an opportunity to study this amendment. It is apparently a bill prepared by Senator NORBECK, which has never been considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency. I would like to ask the Senator from Mississippi if this amendment permits the War Finance Corporation to purchase direct from individuals?

Mr. HARRISON. Their securities, yes; bills of exchange, as enumerated there, drafts secured by bills of lading, or other instruments in writing conveying or securing merchantable title to said foodstuffs or wool or cotton, or any articles manufactured therefrom.

Mr. McLEAN. Does it authorize the taking of the notes of individuals?

Mr. HARRISON. It does.

Mr. McLEAN. To that extent it enlarges very materially the present scope of the War Finance Corporation.

Mr. HARRISON. The present War Finance Corporation does not loan directly to individuals. It loans directly to associations, and to individuals only through the banks, and so forth.

Mr. McLEAN. To the banks.

Mr. HARRISON. To that extent it would enlarge the powers of the War Finance Corporation.

Mr. McLEAN. If I remember correctly, that proposition was brought to the attention of the Senate at the time the War Finance Corporation bill was before the Senate, and very serious objection was raised to the very provision which the Senator now advocates, because in the operation of the War Finance Corporation, the Senator will understand, very careful management is required.

If it had not been in the best of hands I am very certain that it would have done more harm than good; but fortunately it has been exceedingly well managed, and if the Senator had heard the testimony before the Committee on Banking and Currency he would have realized that under the operation of the law as it is these funds do go direct to the farmers, through the banks, in almost every instance where it has been necessary. As I said yesterday, in North Dakota the War Finance Corporation has loaned to 600 banks, upon the notes of 26,000 farmers. When you extend that power to the War Finance Corporation and give them the right to take notes from individuals, unless you have the very best of management, you are engaging in something which, to my mind, is exceedingly unwise.

With regard to the handling of our foreign exports, I would like to say to the Senator that one of the leading exporters of cotton from the South appeared before our committee and testified that at the present time Germany is consuming nearly her normal quantity of cotton, and paying for it without the least trouble. There is no difficulty to-day in financing our foreign exports where the foreigner has funds. There is no need whatever of extending in this country any additional facilities beyond those now exercised by the War Finance Corporation. I call these things to the attention of the Senator because I believe that his amendment is unnecessary and unwise.

Mr. LENROOT. May I add that the testimony shows not only is there no difficulty in farmers here securing credit if the foreigner has power to liquidate, but there is no difficulty of the foreigner himself getting the credit.

Mr. McLEAN. That is the idea I intended to convey. Germany sold in this country nearly a billion dollars worth of marks when they were far below par, and that credit is here now. We have purchased large totals of foreign securities, and we have loaned large sums of money, and credits are here, and this exporter from the South assured the committee that there was no difficulty whatever in financing the sale of goods to foreign purchasers.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator thinks it is a perfectly sound business proposition; his only objection is, as I understand, that there is no necessity for it. Is that right?

Mr. McLEAN. I do not think it is sound to give to this corporation, a bureau here in Washington, the power to buy the paper of individuals. I should hope they would not exercise it. I think it much preferable that it go through a bank and carry a bank's indorsement.

Mr. HARRISON. This allows the banks to discount certain paper.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not object to that, where a bank will indorse the paper.

Mr. HARRISON. It also empowers and authorizes them to use their discretion in saying whether it is good or not.

Mr. McLEAN. I think Congress is going too far. I think we should require the indorsement of an established banking institution if we are to take money out of the Treasury of the United States and loan it to individuals.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, it is very true that this proposition was advanced before. It was advanced when we amended the War Finance Corporation act. At that time we tried to incorporate a provision giving power to the War Finance Corporation to loan money directly to individuals. It is quite true that a majority of the Senate was at that time opposed to that proposal. I was very heartily in favor of it. I am in favor of a proposition such as that being incorporated in the Lenroot-Anderson bill, which will follow the Capper bill. I shall attempt to have it amended in that particular. So I have not changed my opinion about that proposition at all, and when we drafted the bill amending the War Finance Corporation act there was an amendment, not in the exact wording of this amendment, but the idea was there, that the War Finance Corporation could loan money either to foreign interests or foreign governments, where the security was good, where it was to go to purchase agricultural products in this country, and the money was to be expended in the United States. That went out, not by a vote of the Senate but because of the compromise measure that was adopted it was thought wise by a majority of the Senate to leave it out.

I do not agree with the Senator from Connecticut or with the Senator from Wisconsin that there is not now a need for the sale of surplus agricultural products of this country and that there is now a sufficient credit among foreign nations for the purchase of them. I believe quite to the contrary, and I also believe that this amendment would furnish a safe and splendid channel by which the farmers of America could dispose of their surplus products either to a foreign Government or to foreign citizens, provided they put up the right kind of security. I would not stand for a moment for the proposition that the law should not provide that the security should be adequate, because I want to see the Government absolutely safeguarded. I do not want to see the Government go into an adventuresome proposition. But the trouble is that there are some of us who have more confidence and faith in the integrity and in the ability of the men who comprise the War Finance Corporation than others have. I have great respect for the personnel of that corporation. I think the reviving of that corporation and the manner in which it has discharged its duties has been the one thing done since this administration was inducted into power that has really given relief. I am sorry I can not say more things have been done, but that is one thing which, so far as my State is concerned, I am sure has brought a very large measure of relief to the farmers of Mississippi, and I believe it has been of benefit to farmers all over the country. Of course, the restrictive provisions of the law compelled individuals to seek relief through the banks, and in many instances, perhaps, individual wants were not taken care of, but, as a whole, the situation among farmers and bankers was helped, and thousands of communities felt indirectly, if not directly, its good effect.

Mr. McLEAN. May I ask the Senator if he has submitted it to the manager of the War Finance Corporation, and whether it is approved by the War Finance Corporation?

Mr. HARRISON. I think the War Finance Corporation would oppose it.

Mr. McLEAN. I think they would.

Mr. HARRISON. I have more faith in the War Finance Corporation than the War Finance Corporation has in itself.

Mr. McLEAN. I understood the Senator to say he had the highest regard for the personnel of the War Finance Corporation.

Mr. HARRISON. I have; but the trouble about it in the beginning was that the War Finance Corporation thought we were piling so much work on them and giving them such a vast opportunity that they were afraid they might fall down under the weight of the load placed upon them, so they protested and said, "Oh, do not enlarge the power to that extent." But the farmers of the great Middle West have surplus crops, the prices of their products have decreased, and it will never increase until they sell and dispose of their surplus crops. The same thing is true of cotton, although there is such a small crop of cotton, of course, that it is being sold, and sold at a fair price, though the producers ought to get more for it. But the corn farmer and the wheat farmer must dispose of their surplus crop, and here is an opportunity to give to this great agency of the Government, which has millions and hundreds of millions of dollars lying idle, an opportunity to loan it on good security and let it be distributed in that way among the farmers of the country, so that they can dispose of their crops, now piled high or stored away. I want to see some of this much-talked-of "return to prosperity" make itself felt among the farming classes. They can not feel it or see it, unless, sirs, you give them an opportunity to market their surplus crops by either finding a market or creating a system by which a lacking credit may be supplied. That is what this amendment will do. If it is sound, even though we may on this floor differ as to its necessity, why not resolve the doubt in favor of the agricultural interests. It can do no harm, and the possibilities for good are manifold.

Mr. McLEAN. If the Senator from Mississippi will permit, I want to insist that in order to sell their crops they must have markets, somebody who wants to buy them. The Senator will concede that.

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. McLEAN. My position is that if there is anybody who wants to buy, and has the wherewith to pay for the products, there is no difficulty whatever in managing the exchange.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator does not think they have the cash at this time over in Germany, for instance, and in a lot of other countries of continental Europe?

Mr. McLEAN. I just said to the Senator that they are purchasing this year something like a million and a half bales of cotton. They are making their payments without any trouble at all.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes; but they might be purchasing two or three million bales if they had more credit.

Mr. McLEAN. They are purchasing all they can consume, as much as they consumed in Germany before the war.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator will recall that perhaps the largest exporter of cotton in all the South appeared before our committee and stated that the people abroad had no difficulty whatsoever in getting all the credit and all the bank accommodations necessary for all the cotton they could utilize over there.

Mr. HARRISON. Let us pass cotton by. Let us assume that is true. That is not true of wheat, of corn, and of live stock.

Mr. McLEAN. Precisely the same situation exists. The trouble is that there is an excess of about 650,000,000 bushels of wheat above pre-war production.

Mr. HARRISON. That is the point. We have to dispose of that surplus.

Mr. McLEAN. Where are you going to sell it if nobody wants it?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator just assumes that nobody wants it. He assumes that there is no market for it. I assume that there is a market if the people had the credit to buy, and I am trying to afford an opportunity for them to get some credit, provided they can offer good security. This does not compel the corporation to loan any money but only authorizes them to loan the money provided the demand is made.

Mr. McLEAN. They have all the credit they want now if they have the security.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator may believe that, and the Senator from Wisconsin may believe it——

Mr. McLEAN. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. HARRISON. But there are millions of Americans who do not believe it. In Europe to-day there are millions of dollars' worth of good securities, but the owners of them find these securities worthless when it comes to borrowing money in those countries on them.

Mr. GLASS. My friend the Senator from Mississippi said something about hundreds of millions of dollars lying around idle. I would like to know where they are. Only day before yesterday the Government of the United States had to borrow $300,000,000 and issued Treasury certificates at 4½ per cent with which to do it. Where are these hundreds of millions of dollars lying around loose and idle?

Mr. HARRISON. I made that statement because the War Finance Corporation has $500,000,000. I think that is the amount.

Mr. GLASS. No; the War Finance Corporation has a credit with the Treasury Department, a book credit, of $500,000,000; but the Treasury Department has not any money lying around loose and idle. It is having to borrow money every day in the world at a pretty stiff rate of interest.

Mr. HARRISON. But that money is there, and was designated by Congress for a specific purpose. It is there. It is not used in any other manner.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator is mistaken in saying the money is there. There is no money there. There is nothing but a credit there. If the Government gets the money, it has to go out and sell Treasury certificates at 4½ per cent to get it. There is no money lying around idle. That is a fiction.

Mr. HARRISON. If there is no money lying around idle, I am in favor of going out and getting the money to loan to these farmers and to those who may buy their products on good security.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the Senator if he is not confusing purchasing power with credit facility. There is a very great lack of purchasing power in Europe, owing to the fact that the average individual is not employed or is not receiving such wages as give him purchasing power, and that individual has not the credit, very naturally. But the amendment does not propose to reach that individual. The people the amendment would reach now have the credit; but the trouble is they can not sell, because the purchasing power of the country is lacking.

Mr. HARRISON. I can not agree with the Senator wholly on that proposition. I think the amendment would aid very materially. It will strengthen and popularize the measure now being considered.

Now, Mr. President, if there is no other discussion on the amendment I am ready for a vote.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator will permit me, I would like to read a paragraph from the testimony of Mr. Howard, who appeared before the committee upon the subject. The Senator from Mississippi no doubt is acquainted with Mr. Howard. He is general sales manager for the American Cotton Growers' Exchange, composed of eight cotton States organized for cooperative cotton marketing. Among other things, he said:

I have charge, among other things, of the export sales of cotton.

He said further:

In regard to the present situation, in cotton particularly, that with which I am most familiar, I do not find that there is any proper demand from England or continental markets for special credits. I sell the Continent in dollars, payable in New York or payable on arrival of the steamer at the European port, and the buyers there seem to have no difficulty in securing credits to pay for all the cotton they wish to buy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays having been ordered on the amendment, does the Senator from New Hampshire desire a quorum call?

Mr. MOSES. If the yeas and nays have been ordered, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll to ascertain the presence of a quorum.

So Mr. HARRISON's amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill. I am not opposed to the bill; I am satisfied with it and with all of its features, except that I think the title to the bill may be misleading. As a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I had an opportunity for two weeks to listen to the hearings on the bill, and it was plainly understood from the beginning that the bill was not an agricultural credit measure, but that it was a live-stock loan bill designed to provide for the formation and supervision of live-stock corporations; in other words, to obtain credit for the cattlemen of the West. In fact, the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] stated before the committee the first day he appeared that the bill was not intended as a farm-credit bill; that it was not intended to help the man with 50 head of cattle or the man who had a hundred head of cattle; but that it was intended to take care of the big cattle concerns of the West which run a thousand head or so of cattle; and it may serve a very good purpose at that. Not much, however, is expected from the bill by its advocates. Some have said that they hoped a half dozen companies would be organized; some have said that they hoped that the number might be 50; but, admitting that it might be 100, the bill after all will afford but a very small addition to the 30,000 banks that extend credit throughout the country.

My amendment simply goes to this question. Section 1 of the bill reads:

That this title may be cited as "the Federal agricultural credits act."

Thus it preempts the ground. One of the things we are contending for is a sane, practical farm-credits act; and I do not propose, so far as I am concerned, that a cattle loan corporation act shall be denominated "the Federal agricultural credits act." So I send to the desk an amendment and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 1, section 1, in lines 5 and 6, it is proposed to strike out the words:

That this title may be cited as "the Federal agricultural credits act."

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That this title may be cited as "the Federal live-stock corporation loan act."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, if that change in the language of the bill shall be made, other changes ought to be made, because, as the Senator from South Dakota knows, the proposed corporations are denominated throughout the bill as "Federal agricultural credit corporations," and the title of the bill was framed to correspond with its provisions, which relate solely to Federal agricultural credit corporations. I hope, therefore, the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency is correct, and I shall endeavor to have other amendments to the bill adopted if the one which I now offer shall be agreed to, which I hope it may. We do not wish to practice deception upon the farmers at this time, and to pass a bill which relates to something else and yet call it an agricultural credits act. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. McLEAN. The bill goes further than to provide credit for cattle companies; it includes all agricultural products. There is no exception made in favor of cattle companies. It includes them, but it also includes everything that is grown on the farm. I see no force whatever in the proposition of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, it seems to me that there ought to be some amendment to Title I of the bill. Unless there be an amendment, the people of the country are going to be very grossly misled concerning what the bill is, especially if this should be the only bill that should be passed upon the subject of agricultural credits at this session. However, may I suggest to the Senator from South Dakota that if he would strike out the words "live stock" from his amendment and insert "agricultural" it would meet the objection of the Senator from Connecticut and avoid any other and further amendments to the bill?

Mr. McLEAN. I should have no objection to the amendment in that form.

Mr. NORBECK. I will say that that would be satisfactory to me, if the word "corporation" should be retained in the bill, because that would describe what the bill is. It provides for the organization of and regulation of cattle credit corporations.

Mr. LENROOT. My suggestion is to leave the language as the Senator has proposed it, but to strike out the words "live stock" and to insert the word "agricultural."

Mr. NORBECK. Why not put them both in? I will accept any change that will leave the word "corporation" in, because the bill provides for regular corporations to be formed for the purpose I have indicated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand the Senator to desire to perfect his amendment?

Mr. NORBECK. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment as modified will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 1, in lines 5 and 6, it is proposed to strike out the words "the Federal agricultural credits act" and to insert the words "the Federal agricultural corporation loan act."

Mr. McLEAN. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire the yeas and nays on his amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the chairman of the committee has accepted the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Connecticut has accepted the amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. I hardly think the chairman of the committee by accepting it assumes to preclude the Senate from voting upon it. The point has been made that he accepts the amendment and that that settles it. I hardly think that ought to follow.

Mr. McLEAN. The amendment which the chairman of the committee is willing to accept is that the title shall be "The Federal agricultural corporation loan act." I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, it seems to me that the suggestion coming from the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] does not meet the situation; and, so far as the farmers of the United States are concerned, I deem the matter an important one. This measure as framed will be of no value whatever to the farmers of my State, and it will not be used by them. It does not provide an agricultural credits system which will be practicable in the State of Iowa, nor do I believe it will be used in the neighboring States. Therefore I think the words "live stock" should be inserted in the title. The words "and other agricultural purposes" might also be in it, but the words "live stock" certainly ought to be retained,

I think the bill, if finally enacted, will be of some benefit, perhaps, to the Western States. They already have formed live-stock associations which, I understand, will fit into this legislation; and if that is true, I am willing that they should have the benefit of the measure; but I do not want to go back to the farmers of Iowa and say that I voted for an agricultural credits corporation act or anything of that kind when I feel at the same time that it will be of no benefit to them.

I wish to state further, Mr. President, with reference to this measure, that, in my opinion, we are off on the wrong foot in endeavoring to establish any kind of farm credit corporation. I think any farm credit system ought to be cooperative in its organization. This measure will not meet the purposes of the great farm movement in the United States. Anyone can go out to a farm organization anywhere, for instance, to Red Brick Local 659, and can ascertain from them all about what a cooperative association is. They will also say that the farmers are entitled to credit associations that are cooperative, and they will know immediately that this measure does not meet their demands.

In the State of Iowa there are 1,900 banks organized on the corporation system, and yet there is not a single bank in the State of Iowa that fits into the business of agriculture, although agriculture represents more than three-fourths of all the business of the State. The control of the credit system is such that the commercial idea dominates it. That idea runs clear up through our whole banking structure, and even dominates the policy of the Federal reserve system. That policy admittedly does not fit the business of agriculture.

Here we have all this talk about the length of time. Here is agriculture, the basic business of this country, with one-third of the capital investment of the whole country, and, as I have figured it out, agriculture is furnishing in this great banking organization about 40 per cent of the bank deposits of the country; and yet in the whole credit organization it is ignored, and it is not considered as a business at all, and our whole program is fixed from the commercial standpoint.

I see no reason, except the arbitrary reason that has gone with the banker's idea of the business turnover, against making this time limit all the way through up to the full length of time of the farmer's turnover. I feel, therefore, that we have started wrong. I believe we had better have worked out a real cooperative association, under cooperative control, and that would mean under the control of the farmers themselves. Bankers' associations of the State of Iowa tell me that there never has been a time when the farmers did not deposit more money in the banks of our State than they had back for use in agriculture. If that is true in Iowa, I believe it is more than true in almost every other State of the Union, because we are big borrowers out there.

The State of Iowa is the feeding ground for all the western country. Great numbers of range cattle are brought in to the Kansas City market and the Omaha market and the Sioux City market, and the Iowa farmers buy them and take them out on the farm and feed their crops to them. That takes a large amount of credit—more, I believe, than is required in any other agricultural State—and yet in our State the farmers collectively have more bank deposits than they ever have used.

The whole trouble comes from the fact that we are organized on this commercial basis, and not on the cooperative basis. Since we are organized in that way and this flow of credit is controlled by the banking idea rather than by the agricultural idea, we are short of credits in our State; and in the whole United States I feel that the discrepancy is much greater. As nearly as I can tell on the basis of statements from officers of the Federal reserve bank, the farmers deposit more than 25 per cent of the total deposits in the banks of the United States; and yet, if you will take the report of 1920, which analyzes this, you will find that that would amount in the national banks to over $4,000,000,000, or about that, and yet they received back for use for agricultural purposes the total sum of $1,998,000,000.

The farmer is not permitted, I repeat, under the laws, either of the States or of the United States, to organize his own funds under his own control. They are organized on a commercial idea. Therefore, I feel that the title of this bill should be restricted to the particular purpose which it will more fully serve.

A motion having been prepared here in line with these suggestions, I move to insert the words "live stock and" before the word "agricultural," so as to read as follows:

That this title may be cited as "The Federal live stock and agricultural corporation loan act."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out lines 5 and 6 on page 1 and to insert:

SECTION 1. That this title may be cited as "The Federal live stock and agricultural corporation loan act."

Mr. McLEAN. I have no objection to that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I have decided to offer another amendment in harmony with this. The first part of the title of the bill reads as follows:

To provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States—

And so forth. I propose to amend it so as to read as follows:

To provide for incorporation and supervision of corporations formed for the purpose of making agricultural and live-stock loans.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time to take up amendments to the title is after the bill is passed. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I suggest that on page 2, line 1, there ought to be inserted, after the words "United States," the words "to be known as Federal live-stock and agricultural loan corporations." That designates the names of the corporations to be formed under this act, in order to conform to the title.

Mr. McLEAN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move, then, to insert after the word "States," in line 1, page 2, the words "to be known as Federal live-stock and agricultural loan corporations." Then I presume in line 23 the word "credit" ought to go out, so that the name of each corporation organized under this act shall include the words "Federal" and "agricultural loan."

Mr. McLEAN. I do not think there should be any amendment on line 23. We are simply naming the corporations there.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is inconsistent with the title.

Mr. McLEAN. I know it is inconsistent, but I think the Senator's amendment is entirely unnecessary.

Mr. FLETCHER. I make no point about it.

Mr. McLEAN. I hope the Senator will not insist upon it. I think it is entirely unnecessary and will tend to complicate rather than to clarify the language of the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not disposed to differ with the chairman on that subject. Since the words "agricultural credit" seem to be eliminated from the title, I thought perhaps they should not occur again in line 23 as a necessary part of the name. I do not, however, insist on the amendment, if the chairman prefers to leave it that way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, line 1, after the words "United States," it is proposed to insert the following words:

To be known as Federal live stock and agricultural loan corporations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then on line 5, page 4, I move that the word "regulating" be stricken out and that in lieu thereof the word "defining" be inserted, so that it will read:

To prescribe by its board of directors by-laws not inconsistent with law or the regulations of the Comptroller of the Currency defining the manner in which its general business may be conducted—

Instead of "regulating."

Mr. McLEAN. Why not put them both in?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think it is necessary to insert both. It is just a repetition.

Mr. McLEAN. Either word covers the subject completely, but I have no objection.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the word "defining" is better than the word "regulating."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 4, line 5, it is proposed to strike out the word "regulating" and in lieu thereof to insert the word "defining."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I shall not move to strike out paragraph (8), but I raise the question there whether or not it is advisable to establish these branches. The committee seems to have thought it was well to provide for establishing and maintaining branches or agencies of these corporations everywhere. It seems to me the provision is a very questionable one, but if the committee is satisfied with it I am. I make no point about it.

Mr. McLEAN. They are not banks. They will not compete with commercial banks of deposit. It seems to me it will be a great convenience for them to have branches, and I can see no possible objection to it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move to insert, on page 6, line 13, after the word "market," the words "or by Federal farm-loan bonds as collateral."

Warehouse receipts or other like documents, or chattel mortgages, or other instruments conferring a first and paramount lien upon live stock which is being fattened for market, are considered sufficient security under the bill. I believe that farm-loan bonds are just as good security as a chattel mortgage on a cow or a thousand cows, depending upon the value of the face of the bonds, and I see no reason why Federal farm-loan bonds should not be accepted as security for paper of this kind. That is the object of the amendment.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, what becomes of the theory that the Federal reserve notes shall be based upon self-liquidating paper, short-time paper? We went all through that controversy when we made United States bonds eligible for rediscount. We are trying to get that long-time investment paper out of the banks, and the law especially provides that no such security shall be eligible. It shuts out all manner of stocks and bonds. Farm-loan bonds are no better than municipal bonds; and when you let that class of paper into the Federal reserve system and make it eligible as security for the issuance of bank notes payable in gold on demand you are violating the basic principle upon which the Federal reserve system was founded.

Mr. FLETCHER. The difference between the chairman of the committee and myself is about this: He considers security liquid provided it matures within a certain length of time. I consider security liquid if it is good. If it is perfectly safe, if it has the value behind it and means cash whenever demand is made, in my judgment it is a liquid security. The farm-loan bonds are not only valuable, are not only secured, in the first place, by the obligation of the borrower, by the mortgage upon his premises to the extent of 50 per cent of the actual value of his land and 20 per cent of the value of the insured buildings upon his land, but back of that also is the indorsement of the national farm loan association of which he is a member. Back of that is the responsibility of the Federal land bank that issues the bond. Back of that is the approval of the Farm Loan Board authorizing the issue of the bond; and those bonds are by law made security for protecting the accounts of guardians and trustees and administrators and executors in practically all the States of the Union.

They are salable upon the open market. The last issue of $75,000,000 was taken in two hours after they were offered at 4½ per cent and above par, so that it seems to me that a bond of that sort is as good a security back of this paper as a mortgage on cattle, which may die the next week.

Mr. McLEAN. We lived for 50 years or more under a bond-secured currency and we got tired of it. We established the Federal reserve system for the purpose of securing an elastic currency. If we should go back to the bond-secured currency, we might as well include Government and other bonds and abandon all idea that our Federal reserve system will continue as a system for the issuance of an elastic currency. We would deprive it of its elastic properties the moment we qualify bonds as security for the notes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 6, line 13, after the word "market," the last word in the line, insert a comma and the following words "or by Federal farm-loan bonds as collateral."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FLETCHER. I may say that I will raise that question again at some other time, but will let that verdict, as to this particular bill, remain as it has been rendered.

On page 7, line 8, it seems to me there ought to be an express provision allowing the substitution. By inference it follows that there may be substitution, but I can see no objection to making it clear. After the word "securities," in line 8, page 7, we should insert the words "the right of substitution being hereby granted." The inference is that it would be granted.

Mr. McLEAN. Clearly so. I can not see any necessity for the amendment suggested by the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. It simply expressly authorizes the substitution of securities.

Mr. McLEAN. It is authorized under the language of the bill, is it not?

Mr. FLTECHER. I do not think it is clearly authorized.

Mr. McLEAN. It reads, "other instruments which may be pledged as security therefor, the provision which may be made with regard to release, substitution, or exchange of such securities," under the authority of the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. FLETCHER. Is there any objection to saying, "the right of substitution being hereby granted"?

Mr. McLEAN. No; I have no objection.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 7, line 8, after the word "securities" and the comma, to insert the words "the right of substitution being hereby granted."

Mr. LENROOT. May I suggest that if that language is adopted there will at once be raised the very serious doubt as to whether the exchange of securities will be authorized, unless we make the same amendment in the other place.

Mr. McLEAN. That is true.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FLETCHER. The only point about that is that the right of substitution must exist, and "provisions which may be made with regard to release, substitution," and so forth, do not give that right. Obligations maturing prior to the debt for which the obligation is made may often be pledged as security; and without the right of substitution the borrower is at a disadvantage in the matter of interest, or the borrower may find it desirable to sell some of the live stock before the maturity of his debt. Unless we expressly allow substitution, I do not see that he has that right under the language as it is. I am not disposed to press it further.

On page 9, under the head of "Limitation," in line 3, I move to insert, after the word "incur," the word "direct," so that it will read, "No corporation organized under this act shall incur direct liabilities," and so forth, and strike out the words "whether direct or contingent, in excess of ten times its paid-in capital." There may come a time as to contingent liabilities when the entire amount of a loan will exceed ten times the capital. Then they would have to quit business; whereas I think we should restrict their limitation there to their direct obligations and not extend it to contingent obligations, which refers to the entire amount of outstanding business.

Mr. McLEAN. A contingent obligation might become as binding or interfere just as seriously with the solvency of the institution as a direct obligation.

Mr. FLETCHER. It seems to me eventually they might have to quit business when they got to the amount of their entire obligations, contingent on all the debentures they have issued, even ten times the amount of their surplus and capital. I do not think that is meant. I think it means the direct obligations.

Mr. McLEAN. Will the Senator give us an instance of a contingent obligation that might not impair the solvency of the corporation?

Mr. FLETCHER. Suppose one of these corporations should have such a business that the total borrowing during a three-year period, which is the life of the debentures, would be restricted to ten times the capital. Then, when the limit had been reached no current business could be done, because there is a contingent liability on the entire amount of the business done for the three years. It is presumed that obligations of others which are sold and transferred have within themselves sufficient security to find a purchaser. Contingent liabilities of banks, such as rediscounts, and so forth, are specifically excepted from reserves, and I do not see why as to these corporations contingent liabilities should not be excepted from the requirements above the 10 per cent of the paid-in surplus and capital.

Mr. McLEAN. The debentures would be a direct liability.

Mr. FLETCHER. They might not be if they are used simply to obtain money on, if they are simply indorsed.

Mr. McLEAN. If they indorse their own obligation, there is a direct liability, is there not?

Mr. FLETCHER. It seems to me if you broaden this so as to include all their liabilities—liabilities whether direct or contingent—you will reach a time in the operation of these corporations within the three years when they will have to stop doing any current business.

Mr. McLEAN. I dislike very much to consent to an amendment of that character, but if this passes the Senate and goes to the House the House committee can consider it, and if there is no objection to it it can be adopted there. But I dislike very much to increase the limit which these concerns may loan above ten times their paid-in, unimpaired capital and surplus. It seems to me that is as far as we should go.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the chairman of the committee feels that way about it and feels that this language is not too broad, so that it will not paralyze these institutions, I am not disposed to press the matter.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me inquire of the Senator from Florida what kind of a contingent liability it is possible for one of these corporations to incur? It issues its debentures. It does not even indorse them. It issues them and sells them. Of course, a man may be contingently liable upon a bond for the faithful performance of an act by some one else. That is, if someone else does not perform the duty, he becomes liable on the bond. But I am unable to discover here that these corporations are entitled to enter into any kind of contract under which they would be contingently liable. I accordingly think that in a practical way the effect of the legislation would be just exactly the same whether the word "contingent" is left in or not.

Unless their effectiveness is going to be impaired by reason of the fact that they do incur extensive contingent liabilities, I would see no reason for taking it out. So I rose to inquire of the Senator from Florida if he can inform us what contingent liabilities such a corporation is authorized to incur that might, as he fears, limit its activities.

Mr. FLETCHER. This would mean that the total borrowings during three years, which is the life of the debentures, can not exceed ten times the paid-in and unimpaired capital and surplus.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Quite so; but is not that the case if you take "contingent" out and leave it simply providing for the direct liabilities, and so on? All of these debentures are direct liabilities of the corporation, not contingent liabilities.

Mr. GLASS. The corporation is authorized, under the provisions of the bill, to engage in the acceptance business, which is strictly a contingent liability business.

Mr. LENROOT. To buy and sell notes, even without their indorsement.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is the kind of paper that would be contingent. It is supposed that that paper is secured when it is offered to the corporation. It carries its own security. The corporation sells it, and there is a contingent liability there. Of course, the corporation may be looked to eventually to take care of that paper, and that is a contingent liability in my mind. That is what I had in mind when I made the suggestion. It is a contingent liability, but the paper itself is secured originally, carries its own security, and the makers are primarily looked to. The corporation would be looked to eventually, perhaps, and that, as I said, is a contingent liability. The total volume of all that business during three years can not exceed ten times the paid up capital and surplus. If it does, the corporation must stop business. It can not take care of current business at all any further. It seems to me that provision makes it ineffective, unless you limit it to direct liabilities.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me follow that a little further. Subdivision 2 authorizes the corporation "to make advances upon or to discount, rediscount, or purchase, and to sell or negotiate, with or without its indorsement or guaranty, notes secured by chattel mortgages conferring a first and paramount lien upon maturing and breeding live stock," and so forth.

There is a contingent liability, as a matter of course, upon obligations of that character. The direct obligation is the obligation of the makers of the instruments.

But would the Senator from Florida put no limitation whatever upon the liability of the bank, contingent as it may be, arising from the purchase and sale of paper of that character? Would the Senator allow it to go on and incur liabilities of that character, contingent though they be, to an unlimited amount?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the provision is confined to direct liabilities and gives sufficient protection.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator think anybody would buy the debentures if there were no limitation upon the amount of rediscount that may be made with the indorsement of the corporation? It seems to me no investor would think of doing so unless there were some limitation upon the contingent liability.

Mr. FLETCHER. We have a limit of 10 per cent upon the direct liability. It seems to me that is sufficient protection, so long as we confine the direct liability to 10 per cent.

Mr. LENROOT. How is it any protection to the investor in a debenture if there may be an unlimited contingent liability upon rediscounts?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think there would be an unlimited contingent liability there. It is not supposed, as I said, that the bank would primarily be liable upon any of the rediscounts. The law with reference to contingent liabilities of banks is that such matters as rediscounts are specifically exempted from the requirements as to reserve. I do not see why the same rule should not apply here.

Mr. McLEAN. If the maker of a note did not pay it, it might become a liability that would seriously impair the solvency of the corporation.

Mr. FLETCHER. I believe it will be found that the provision, if it remains in the bill as it is, will make almost ineffective the organizations. The business would be so limited that it would not amount to very much. Still I am not disposed to press the matter. I have called the attention of the chairman of the committee to it, and I hope he will think it over. I ask for a vote upon it anyway.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 9, line 3, before the word "liabilities," insert the word "direct," and after the word "liabilities" strike out the comma and the words "whether direct or contingent" and the comma after the word "contingent."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, under section 6 the provision is that—

> Any corporation organized under the provisions of this act may take, receive, reserve, and charge on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidence of debt, interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the State in which such obligation is by its terms made payable.

I move to amend by striking out, on page 10, lines 1 and 2, the words "such obligation is by its terms made payable" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "its principal office is located."

For instance, we might have one of these corporations organized in one State making loans in other States. I saw a statement in the minority report, I believe it was, by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] to the effect that a number of States have a contract rate of 12 per cent and a number of other States have a contract rate of 10 per cent. If we are going to be of any benefit to agriculture and to the live-stock raiser and to the producer generally, we must furnish the money, if we furnish it at all, at a reasonable rate. It does not avail the farmer to pay 12 per cent interest on the money which he must have. His business will not stand any such rate as that.

Under the bill all the corporation has to do is to take the paper in one State and make it payable in another State where such paper bears 12 per cent interest. Perhaps the borrower is doing business in a State where the legal rate is 6 per cent. That is where the principal place of business of the corporation is, and where its principal office is located, and there the legal rate of interest is 6 per cent. The bill would allow them to make the note payable in another State where the rate of interest is 12 per cent, and the borrower has to pay the rate of interest wherever the paper is made payable.

Mr. McLEAN. The borrower would know, of course, what interest he was bound to pay and would have something to say about it. If the rate were too high, he would go to some other source.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The very purpose of the provision is to meet exactly that situation. It recognizes that the borrower, being pressed, will submit to an exorbitant rate of interest, and accordingly we put in a provision to help him so that an exorbitant rate of interest shall not be exacted of him. But the Senator has called attention to the fact that the purpose may be evaded very easily by making the obligation payable in a State that has the high rate of interest.

Mr. McLEAN. The borrower would have something to say about it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. He would have something to say about it, but the provision is put in here because we know as a matter of experience that the borrower does not contract freely with respect to interest rates. Usury laws are founded upon the basis that he does not contract freely. Usury laws are founded upon the assumption that the lender has a power over him that he will exercise if he can, and, therefore, we have put in the provision limiting the rate which the lender may exact, but attention is called to the fact that the provision would be inoperative to accomplish the purpose that is intended to be reached.

Mr. FLETCHER. I can see no reason why the rate should not depend upon the rate in the State or locality where the principal office of the corporation is located.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. Would it not be fairer if it were made dependent upon the residence or domicile of the borrower? Is it wise to have a Federal statute that would permit exaction of a higher rate of interest in a State than the laws of that State itself permits?

Mr. FLETCHER. The amendment I have offered would cover that.

Mr. LENROOT. We might have the principal residence of the corporation in a 12 per cent State, making loans in a 6 per cent State.

Mr. McLEAN. It might tie him up to 12 per cent when otherwise he could get a lower rate.

Mr. LENROOT. If it was made dependent upon the residence or domicile of the borrower, then the law would apply in every case, it seems to me.

Mr. FLETCHER. But the language is permissive. It says:

> Any corporation organized under the provisions of this act may take, receive, reserve, and charge on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidence of debt, interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the State in which such obligation is by its terms made payable.

I propose to have that last clause read—> interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the State in which its principal office is located.

Of course, if one goes to a State where the principal office is located, he realizes he will in all probability be asked the legal rate. He may negotiate to get better terms if he can, but the rate may be that rate. I do not know, but I believe if the paper just read "with interest from such and such date" it would mean the legal rate in that State where the principal office was located, without expressly saying what the rate of interest was further than that.

But the vice of the provision, it seems to me, is to enable the paper to be negotiated in one State, that a corporation incorporated under the laws of a certain State, and then have it possible to make that paper payable in some other State where the rate of interest may be twice as high.

No one could be misled if he were making a contract with a corporation whose principal place of business was in a certain city in a certain State. He would expect the rate of interest of that State to control in the transaction. It seems to me the provision would give an advantage to the person furnishing the money to make it payable in some other State, perhaps, without the knowledge of the borrower of what the lender was up to and what was meant.

Mr. McLEAN. The rate would be a matter of contract below the State limit. Anything below the State limit may be agreed upon by the parties and the rate would be stated in the obligation. I confess I do not see any very serious objection to the language of the law as it is. If we do change it, I should hope it would be made to apply to the domicile or residence of the maker. It seems to me the suggestion made by the Senator from Wisconsin is a good one.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not know that it is a new thought at all, but if the idea suggested by the Senator from Florida, as I understand it, were incorporated into the law it would be an inducement for these corporations to be organized in the State where they have the high limit on the rate of interest, and that would carry with it the right to charge the high rate in the other States.

Mr. FLETCHER. The right to do it, but not the obligation to do it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. There would be no obligation.

Mr. McLEAN. It is probable that there would be some competition in the money market in every State in the Union. If any one of the corporations undertook to exact an unreasonable rate, it would not do any business. It is a matter of contract below the State limit. The borrower knows what he is to pay. I think it would be safe to assume he would be pretty careful about it, and he would not borrow money at 12 per cent if he could get it for 6 or 7 per cent.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not see why a corporation of this kind, incorporated under the laws of one State and having its principal office in a certain city in that State, should be permitted to make its paper payable in any other State, wherever it saw fit to make it payable, even though the borrower might be a resident of its own State. That, it seems to me, would be rather an anomalous situation, but the bill authorizes it. There is a corporation, we will say, incorporated in Maryland with its principal office in Baltimore. There is a farmer out near Rockville who negotiates a transaction with the corporation. That corporation may make his note payable in South Dakota or North Dakota under the provisions of the bill. I see no reason for a provision of that kind.

However, Mr. President, it is too late now to discuss the matter further to-night. I have several formal amendments which I desire to take up and which will take some little time. Therefore I suggest that we lay the bill aside for the present.

TUESDAY, January 16, 1923.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed be the Lord God of hosts, who forgiveth all our iniquities, who healeth all our diseases and whose holy purpose is to unfold the capabilities of the human soul. O Father of us all, in the season of prosperity may we be grateful and humble; in the times of adversity may we be patient and resigned. Grant us strength to withstand the temptation and pride that await upon power, and in all things may knowledge be seasoned with wisdom. Permit all good things to survive and succeed. Bless us with the evidence and the comfort of things not seen, for Thy name's sake. Amen.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. MAGEE, Mr. WASON, Mr. BUCHANAN, and Mr. LEE of Georgia.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting in 8-point type my remarks before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on alien property.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD, in 8-point type, his remarks delivered before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on the subject of alien property. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to is here printed in full as follows:

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert a copy of the remarks which I made before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House of Representatives on the subject of alien property, as follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. CLEVELAND A. NEWTON, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF MISSOURI.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, I think the members of the committee know that I have been taking a good deal of interest in the subject of alien property for quite some time. I have heard a good deal of the discussions before this committee, and it seems that the general attitude has been to confuse the German national with the German Government. I think there ought to be a very marked distinction made between the German Government and the national whose property we hold. We owe the nationals of that country who invested here an obligation, which I think ought to be given serious consideration.

We had treaty relations with Germany at the time we went into the war with respect to the nationals; and as you read and reread the pledge that we made in our treaty, and upon which investments by German nationals were made in this country, you realize that those nationals came here and made investments relying upon that pledge, and many of them came through the inducements of our American consuls in Germany. Much of their money was invested in railway stock, and we were needing money for the capitalization of our railroads. Some of that property was invested because of the friendship of nationals over there for their relatives in this country; and when we talk about depredations that were committed during the war, they were depredations committed by the German Government which we were fighting and not by the nationals whose property we hold.

We declared our attitude toward them not only in our treaty but later in the message of the President which preceded the declaration of war. I do not see how we can reconcile holding on to this property now, after the war is over, with the attitude we took then.

There is no doubt on earth, from the information I have, but what the declarations made by the President before Congress as we went into that war, constituted the wedge, and was intended to be the wedge, which drove a division between the rank and file of the people of Germany on the one hand and the kaiser and the military government on the other. A member of General Pershing's staff told me that after the President had made his speech, and while the war was on, they had their airplanes distribute extracts from the speech printed in German over the trenches where the soldiers could read them. They were extracts from the President's message upon which war was declared and which read like this:

"We have no quarrel with the German people. [Applause.] We have no feeling toward them but one of sympathy and friendship. It was not upon their impulse that the Government acted in entering into this war. It was not with their previous knowledge or approval. It was a war determined upon as wars used to be determined upon in the old, unhappy days when the people were nowhere consulted by their rulers."

That was our declaration, and through the President we declared further:

"We are glad, now that we see the facts with no veil of false pretense about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its people, the German people included."

We made a distinction always between the kaiser's government and the German people. We declared that the people of Germany had no control over the war; that they did not start it; that they could not stop it; that they could only carry its burdens. Those people had nothing to do with the depredations committed by the kaiser's government, and yet it is those same people with whom we are dealing now.

The President, in his message to Congress, declared further:

"We are fighting for the rights of the nations, great and small, and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and obedience. We have no selfish ends to serve; we desire no conquest, no dominion; we seek no indemnities for ourselves, no material compensation."

And yet, in the face of this proclamation, our Government has permitted private property belonging to innocent German nationals, who had enough friendship for this country and enough faith to make their investments here, to be sold at public and private sale for sums infinitely less than the real value of such property. Not only that, but now, nearly four years after the war, we are permitting the custodian to hold the inadequate proceeds of such sales, together with other property belonging to German and Austrian nationals.

Our representatives at The Hague conference during all these years have been pioneers in standing for the rights of private property upon land in time of war, and our representatives have tried to induce the other nations to give this protection to private property upon the high seas. And now that we are holding the property of the nationals of a fallen foe it is distressing to see our Government so long delay in complying with the ideals which we have so long advocated.

If you can find any national in this country who owns property in the possession of the custodian and who committed or assisted in committing any of the depredations with which the kaiser's government is charged, then you should hold him to account. But, so far as I know, there are no nationals whose property we hold to whom we can charge any of the depredations of which we complain.

Repeatedly during the war we declared our hostility to the kaiser's government, and our sympathy and friendship for the German people. I have no doubt from all that I have learned but what this proffer of sympathy and friendship made the army lay down and caused the people of Germany to force the kaiser out, an achievement which brought the war to a close while their armies were still in foreign territory. Now that the people of Germany have eliminated that military government and established a Republic I think we should live up to our proffer of friendship, give that Government a helping hand, and keep faith with the nationals for whom we are acting as trustees.

It is interesting to study the provisions of Article XXIII of the treaty in force during the war between the United States and Germany. It reads as follows:

"If war should arise between the two contracting parties, the merchants of either country then residing in the other shall be allowed to remain nine months to collect their debts and settle their affairs and may depart freely, carrying off all their effects without molestation or hindrance; and all women and children, scholars of every faculty, cultivators of the earth, artisans, manufacturers, and fishermen unarmed and inhabiting unfortified towns, villages, or places, and in general all others whose occupations are for the common subsistence and benefit of mankind shall be allowed to continue their respective employments and shall not be molested in their persons nor shall their houses or goods be burned or otherwise destroyed nor their fields wasted by the armed force of the enemy into whose power by the events of war they may happen to fall; but if anything is necessary to be taken from them for the use of such armed force the same shall be paid for at a reasonable price."

The office of the Alien Property Custodian was created within six months after the declaration of war, and I do not know of any German national who was ever permitted to carry off any of his effects which happened to be in this country when war was declared.

The only justification for the creation of the office of Alien Property Custodian was to prevent the nationals who were then our enemies from using their property in this country against us during the war. That was the reason which justified our action at that time, but that reason ceased to exist over four years ago, and still we are holding the property, in the face of our treaty obligation to the German national—a treaty obligation entered into in time of peace when the blood was cool—a treaty obligation which the nationals of Germany and Austria had the right to assume we would faithfully keep, an obligation which plainly provides that the merchant has nine months to carry off all his property, without molestation or hindrance; that all women and children, scholars of every faculty, cultivators of the earth, artisans, manufacturers and fishermen, unarmed inhabiting unfortified towns, villages, and places, and, in general, all others whose occupations are for the common subsistence and benefit of mankind should be allowed to continue their employments without molestation.

Every foreigner in this country engaged in a civil pursuit, manufacturing or anything else which was productive, certainly was included. Note the language: "In general, all others whose occupations are for the common subsistence and benefit of mankind shall be allowed to continue their respective employments, and shall not be molested in their persons, nor shall their houses be burned or otherwise destroyed, nor their fields wasted by the armed force of the enemy into whose power by the events of war they may happen to fall; but if anything is necessary to be taken from them for the use of the armed force the same shall be paid for at a reasonable price."

Could anything be clearer as to the obligation of this Government to protect the national who did not start the war, who could not control the war, who had no power to stop the war, and with whom the President said in his proclamation: "We have no quarrel, we have no dispute with him; we know that he had nothing to do with it." Upon this pledge and under this obligation, he brought his money here and invested it in this country.

I have read the debate at the time the alien property bill was passed, and the statements of those who contended that war terminates all treaties. I have read article 23 of the treaty with Germany. In order to show how determined they were that war should not terminate the treaty, let us read article 24 of that document:

"And it is declared that neither the pretense that war dissolves all treaties, nor any other whatever shall be considered as annulling or suspending this and the next preceding article, but on the contrary, the state of war is precisely that for which they are provided and during which they are to be as sacredly observed as the most acknowledged articles in the law of nature and nations."

Mr. LEA. Assuming that we stand by that agreement, that war shall not abrogate this treaty, and also that shortly after we entered into the war with Germany, contrary to the provisions of that treaty, they took the property of American nationals and assumed control of it, as we did subsequently in the case of German nationals, would you not regard that as having abrogated this treaty?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. We had many reports that have not been verified as to what they did during the war. My understanding of the facts are that there was about $100,000,000 worth of American property in Germany. They actually seized about $20,000,000. They merely listed the balance and permitted our nationals to use it. I have no evidence that in Germany proper they ever sold out or converted any of the property.

Mr. LEA. What I was really getting at was the principle. I will agree that we should dispose of this question on a high moral plane; that we should justify ourselves from the moral standpoint; but I think sometimes in our anxiety to do that we may misinterpret the law. Now, I would draw a distinction between the mere fact of war breaking a treaty and a violation of the terms of that treaty by the other nation with whom we are at war.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I think there was enough to justify seizing the property and holding it during the war. I think that we were morally justified in doing that. I do not think, however, that we have lived up to our treaty fully. I do not think that we had the proof to justify us in going as far as we did. But the war is over now and I think we should fulfill our obligation to the nationals as quickly as possible. I think we should have done that long ago.

Mr. LEA. So far as the nations are concerned, if they violate the specific terms of the treaty after the end of the war, then that would release us from the reciprocal obligation, would it not?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I do not think so.

Mr. LEA. If two parties, for instance, enter into a contract and one man breaks the contract in a material respect, that releases the other. He is not bound to stand by the terms of the contract which becomes unilateral.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. But you entered into a contract with Germany which affected the national and upon which the national relied and made his investment.

Mr. LEA. But the treaty was with the German Government.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. So far as the German Government is concerned; yes, sir.

Mr. LEA. I am discussing the Government, not the individual.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. But I am discussing the individual. I recognize the fact that we would have a right to break the treaty with the Government. If they broke their treaty we would have a right to ignore ours.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would like to call your attention to the provision in the next preceding section, which provides that a breach of the treaty or declaration of war shall not be used as an excuse for saying that the other party has violated it. Have you the language there?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would like to have the language put in.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I have articles 23 and 24.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. What is the last sentence in 24?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri:

"It is declared that neither the pretense that war dissolves all treaties nor any other whatever shall be considered as annulling or suspending this and the next preceding article, but, on the contrary, that the state of war is precisely that for which they are provided and during which they are to be as sacredly observed as the most acknowledged article in the law of nature and nations."

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The expression that you used was "any pretense whatsoever," which is about as broad as can be made, it seems to me.

Mr. HAWES. I was just going to suggest that if we proceeded on that theory, if a belligerent nation should use poisonous gas, murder women and children, and destroy private property, and if you follow the logic of that conclusion, then we would be justified in doing all these things that our traditional policy has opposed.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. That is the situation.

Mr. LEA. Excuse the interruption. That does not follow at all. That does not justify us in doing anything that is of an immoral character, but we simply refuse to be bound from our side of the agreement when the other side has failed to perform their obligation to us. That does not justify us in doing anything immoral.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. We have no evidence that the nationals ever violated the treaty. I think that the Government's violation of the treaty justified our action in creating the custodian's office, but when we had conquered the Government and the national had done nothing offensive, then we should live up to our treaty obligation with the national who made his investment over here upon a guaranty, an implied guaranty at least, from that treaty relation that his property would be protected, and I think his property should be turned back immediately on that ground. And I do not think we were justified under the treaty in selling out and in converting a lot of property that has been converted. I think the sales were not justified.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. In other words, we took more property than we needed to take. We went to extremes in doing that, did we not?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. We not only went to extremes but I heard the Alien Property Custodian during the war in a speech before the Chamber of Commerce of St. Louis say:

I do not know—I am not in a position to say absolutely—how far Congress intended that I should go, but I propose that by the time I have finished the administration of my office there won't be a German who owns any property of any substantial character in the United States.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I think that is true.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Now, the truth of the mafter was that during the war and a great part of the time since the war the custodian was not a custodian, a keeper, a trustee. The present custodian is performing his trust, in my judgment, as sacredly and fairly as a man could. He can not turn this property back without authority of law. I think he is faithfully performing the trust, but I think there were times when the war was on and since when the custodian was an auctioneer instead of a trustee—when he was selling property instead of preserving it, and to that extent we violated our trust. I was a prosecuting officer for about seven or eight years. I always made it a practice as a representative of this Government to conduct myself toward a defendant so that he could never say that his Government had ever taken an unfair advantage of him, and if we criticize Germany for violating her treaty, we should not violate ours.

But, regardless of that, when the war is over and after it has all passed, and we have come to deal with the national—and that is what I want to discuss to-day, the obligation to the national, who had no control over the war, who did not start it, who could not stop it, who had no voice in it, the fellow to whom we pledged our faith—I think we ought to keep faith with him as far as we can. I am not here advocating that we do anything which will violate the mature judgment of the State Department, but I think we ought to grant as much relief as we can.

Mr. DENISON. I want to ask a question right in that connection. The treaty does not put us under any obligation to the national as such. The treaty is an obligation between the two Governments, and the two Governments are the only parties to the treaty. If the nationals have an interest in it, it is incidental, and all the obligation is between the Governments and the Governments only.

Now, let me ask you this: The consideration for the agreement on the part of our Government was the agreement on the part of the German Government and vice versa, the agreement to mutually do certain things. Among other things they agreed mutually to respect the property rights of the merchants and others living in these countries, nationals of the other country. Now, the German Government did not observe this treaty from the beginning. It did not allow the Americans to get out of Germany and take their property, and the German Government has not yet paid Americans for the property losses in their country.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Now, what is there that the German Government seized, except the bank deposits, that has not been turned back?

Mr. DENISON. I do not know myself.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I do. I know that everything was kept intact; I got it from the State Department and I got it from the other sources that they sold nothing. They kept it, and where one of our banks had a million marks in a German bank the German bank tendered it back in kind. Now, the only thing that I have found to be left over there is the marks that were deposited in the banks. The rest of the property has been turned back more than two years—everything that was seized that was of a tangible nature. In fact, the only thing they seized was the money in the banks, and, as a result of the war, it depreciated in value, and the bankers here and the bankers there—or the German Government—have had a controversy on that account. But there is no evidence that they sold out anything like the Bosch magneto, or patents, or anything of that sort over there. They tendered American property back just like they seized it, except that the value of bank deposits went down.

Mr. DENISON. Of course, there is no use of trying to fool ourselves. When they took over gold and offered back paper that is worthless, that is not giving back the property. You can call it paying back in marks if you want to, but we know that as a matter of fact they took over something of value and offered back something without value. Not only that but they took property, destroyed property, of American citizens.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. In Belgium.

Mr. DENISON. Yes. Now, I want to ask you about this mutual obligation, this treaty obligation, the promise of each one, the agreement of each one depending upon the agreement of the other, where the German Government did not comply with the treaty, were we bound by it?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes; we were bound by it so far as nationals are concerned. We entered into that agreement knowing that the national would probably rely on it. We watched him rely upon it. He came here and invested, relying upon that pledge, and by the inducement of our official consular representatives.

Mr. DENISON. But our nationals over there relied on it, too.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes; and they have received their property back. But if they had not, what justification have you for holding all this property? As I understand it, there are around $400,000,000 in American claims against Germany. Ninety per cent of them consist of insurance claims. To whom are you going to pay those claims? The insurance companies received their premiums and the owner of the goods received his money.

Mr. DENISON. I do not know anything about those details.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I am discussing that point. I want to discuss that feature of how much you are going to hold as a guaranty for $400,000,000 claims, and 90 per cent of them insurance claims.

Mr. DENISON. We are not a court to settle those things. That is up to the mixed claims commission.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes; but you propose to hold a guaranty for them, and we know now that 90 per cent of the claims are insurance claims, and to whom are you going to pay these claims? If you pay them to anyone, he will be receiving payment twice.

Mr. DENISON. My own view is that there ought not to be very much of that paid to anyone.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. If you eliminate that, you have not more than $50,000,000 of claims.

The CHAIRMAN. We had testimony here that it was double that amount.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Garvin made the statement before this committee about two years ago that the Secretary of State, Mr. Lansing, had advised him that, considering 100 years' experience of the United States in international claims, that on an average not more than 3 per cent has been allowed; 3 per cent of $400,000,000 would be $12,000,000, and 90 per cent of that is insurance claims.

The CHAIRMAN. But I was not referring to that point. The testimony is that we have about double $400,000,000 in claims.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Well, suppose you have $800,000,000. Ninety per cent of that amount is insurance claims, and, according to the information which I have from the Shipping Board, we are holding ships valued at about $200,000,000.

Mr. GRAHAM. Let me ask you a question there. You are a Member of Congress, Mr. NEWTON, and this is partly your job as well as ours.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I know it is.

Mr. GRAHAM. And you have got to help dispose of it. Would you advise settling and paying all this money to German nationals, disposing of that whole fund, under the present international circumstances, until we are assured that the claims finally determined by the mixed claims commission will be paid?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I think it is all right to hold a reasonable amount, but I do not think we should hold three or four hundred million dollars to guarantee the payment of fifty million dollars.

Mr. GRAHAM. I agree with you.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. If you turn back up to $10,000, that would amount to how much, Mr. Miller?

Mr. MILLER. Under the provisions of this bill it would amount to about $44,000,000.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Then there would be about $300,000,000 of these funds left. If you kept $150,000,000 of that amount with your $200,000,000 of ships, you would have $350,000,000. That should be a fairly good guaranty for our $50,000,000 of claims.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. NEWTON, from an ethical point of view, have you any more excuse for keeping $150,000,000 than you have for keeping $350,000,000?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. As a matter of fact, when you come down to bedrock, I do not think that we have an ethical justification for keeping any of it. If we have a claim because of the depredations of the kaiser, it ought to at least be borne by all the people and not by a few; it certainly should not be taken from those who were friendly enough to come here to invest their money.

As a Member of Congress I am interested, just like the members of this committee, in dealing with these nationals, and there is one thing that has especially rankled in my system. I think the most despicable of all the Germans during the war was Count von Bernstorff, who abused our hospitality and carried on his propaganda here in violation of our neutrality. He has confessed in his book to many things that he did, yet we paid back a million dollars to his wife, an American woman who went over there and married a German title, and we have paid millions more to other women of her kind. I would have made those the last claims to be paid. And yet that was done under a special act recommended by this committee and passed by Congress.

Mr. GRAHAM. When was that?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. That was done about two years ago. We gave Mrs. Von Bernstorff $1,000,000, and we have paid out $75,000,000 more under that act.

Mr. MILLER. I refused to pay her claim when I came in, and she beat me in a court of law.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes; and she did it because this Congress provided the authority which gave to those women the right to their money. You can not justify that on ethical grounds. I would rather pay the poor German girl who had nothing to do with this war and never had a chance to marry an American boy her full claim than to pay an American woman who had a million dollars and went over there to marry a Germant count or a title of some sort.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I agree with you.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I do not think it makes so much difference whether you authorize the release of all the property or only a part of it. If you authorize the release of all claims up to $10,000 and 50 per cent of the balance of the property held, it will take more than a year to prove up all the claims and release the property. It is important, however, that speedy action be taken authorizing the release of a great number of smaller claims, in order to relieve the claimants, who are suffering from starvation in Germany and Austria. If you want to hold enough of the larger claims to guarantee the payment of American claims against Germany, all right. I do not think you can justify that on ethical grounds, but if by doing that you can hasten the enactment of law for the release of the great mass of smaller claims, well and good. But some action should be taken soon.

Though the holding of the larger claims may be unethical and unjustifiable, it is not nearly as bad as a lot of the things which have been done by the custodian in the past. For instance, he sold the Bosch Magneto for a sum infinitely less than its real value; and the sale of 4,000 valuable chemical patents for a mere nominal price is, to my mind, a reflection upon our country's war record. If I had the salvarsan rights in the United States, I would think I had a property worth millions of dollars, and yet I am advised that the custodian put the salvarsan patent up, with some 4,000 other patents, and sold them for $260 each. Think of selling the salvarsan patent for $260 and holding that pitiful sum and refusing to turn it over to its owner!

Mr. DENISON. $260,000?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. No. Salvarsan brought only $260 in with a lot of other patents. They were all put up and sold together for a total sum of $260,000. Now, of course we can not justify that. I think it is a good deal more justifiable to hold the larger claims, though ethically I do not think you can justify holding any of them. Those people are starving over there—people who did not have anything to do with the war—and their property should be released at once.

I have received a lot of sympathetic appeals from the other side. I think I ought to call your attention to a few of them, because they illustrate points that you ought to take care of in the bill. For instance, there is a woman who used to live in Cincinnati, who taught school there for 45 years. She was born in Germany, but became an American citizen.

The CHAIRMAN. In Cincinnati or in Germany? Where did she teach?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. In Cincinnati. Some years ago the city of Cincinnati established an annuity for aged and superannuated teachers. After this woman taught for 45 years she broke down in health. She went to Germany to be treated and was caught in the war. The custodian, as the law requires, is today collecting that $100 per month from the city of Cincinnati, while the old woman, now past 80 years of age, after 45 years of service in the public schools of our country, is starving in Germany.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Had she changed her residence?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. No; she went to the American consul to keep up her citizenship and complied with the law in that regard.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Then why is she not an American citizen, entitled to the money, and why is any legislation needed to get that property back for her?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Because the State Department declared that she was expatriated after the war came on and she did not get home. Now, I think there ought to be something done to release those annuities, and the custodian is still collecting many of them. The custodian ought not to be required to collect incomes after the war is over, and yet under the law he must do it.

Here is another illustration that I think you ought to take care of. After I introduced a bill for the release of German and Austrian property about a year and a half ago I got a letter from an old woman in Berlin. She said: "Here I am, an old woman, dying of hunger in a garret in Berlin, while the great United States holds my money. And I am no German." Then she told me that her father at one time was the largest shipowner in Cuba; that she was educated, with her sister, in a convent in New York and that her brothers were educated in a Jesuit school in New York. One of the girls became ill and the mother took them to Germany. The father died suddenly and the two girls later married German boys. The husband of the one who wrote me had been dead 20 years. She took her Cuban citizenship back, and under the law she is entitled to her property.

Realizing the pathetic condition that the old woman was in, I sent over to the custodian and got blanks and sent them to her and arranged for somebody to act for her with power of attorney over here, and I did this to try to help her get her property, because she had a right to it and was in want. After about four weeks I got a reply from her saying that she had tried diligently but could not raise the money to get the affidavits. Then she itemized the expense of such affidavits. The American consul wanted $5, American money; the counsellor had to have $5; somebody else so much, and the total was $18.50, which at that time was 9,500 German marks and now about 100,000 German marks; and she could not raise the money, and she told me that the only thing that had kept her alive was the fact that some kind people were permitting her to eat one meal a day at their table. There should be speedy relief and some provision made for those people.

I haven't any doubt but what there are a lot of scalpers who have been going around over there who have been practically taking claims away from people because they were so hard up that they would take almost anything for them, because they are starving to death. There should be some provisions to protect these claimants.

Professor Baessman, of Lombard College, Galesburg, Ill., held the chair of literature and English. He had taken out his first papers but had not perfected his citizenship—had not had time. He had four or five thousand dollars invested over here. His father in Germany died in the spring of 1914 and he went over there in June, 1914, to help his mother straighten out her affairs. He was to come back in September to take charge of his work. The war broke out and he could not get back. He is over there now absolutely without money and he can not get any of his money in this country. Not only that, but I believe there are cases where the taxes on the property held are not paid. Have you any provision, Colonel Miller, for paying the taxes on these estates?

Mr. MILLER. We pay them as administrative expenses out of the funds that I have in the trust. If I have no fund in the trust and it is going to sacrifice the property, I either have to sell it or make other arrangements.

Mr. NEWTON, of Missouri. I feel that there ought to be some action taken as speedily as possible upon these claims. To show you how serious the situation is over there, I wrote the Secretary of State a few days ago and asked him what the real conditions were in Germany and Austria. I asked him if he had any authentic information from our consuls or ambassador as to what the conditions were. I told him that appeals were coming in to me from Americans, stating that the people in those countries were on the point of starvation. I want to read from his reply, dated 5th instant:

"MY DEAR MR. NEWTON: I beg to refer to your letter of December 23, 1922, requesting that this department supply you with authentic reports and other information bearing upon the distress reported to be prevailing in Germany and Austria. The inclosed memorandum has been prepared by this department and contains information on the subject with regard to Germany. I will shortly be in a position to give you corresponding data and information relating to the situation in Austria."

The letter is signed "Charles E. Hughes." I will read part of the memorandum:

"The following information and statistics have been submitted to the Department of State by official American representatives in Germany charged with the compilation of such material."

A report dated September 20, 1922, gives a quantitative estimate of grain crops in Germany as follows:

November, 1913: The crop for 1913 was 3,532,617 tons of winter wheat. In 1922 it had fallen to 1,637,157 tons.

In 1913 the summer-wheat yield was 510,467 tons. That fell down in 1922 to 268,566 tons. These reports are from our American consuls.

In 1913 winter spelt—that is a species of rye growing in southern Germany—yielded 437,787 tons, which fell in 1922 to 127,957 tons.

Rye, which is their staple for breadstuffs, had a yield in 1913 of 9,087,150 tons, which fell in 1922 to 5,285,231 tons.

The Secretary of State says that in a report from the consul dated November 23, 1922, the following statement is made:

"It is now thought that the grain supply on hand in Germany will last until February instead of January, 1923, as heretofore reported."

I had information to the effect that the Reparation Commission had stated that the grain supply would only last until January, and it would take 2,000,000 tons of grain to feed the people and keep them from starving during the winter. They had evidently made the same statement in a former report, but later information indicates that their bread supply will last until February.

"This is due to the importation of large quantities of grain from abroad."

Now he makes the statement that they have a good supply of potatoes. That is the only thing they have plenty of. That helps with the breadstuffs, but they can not live on potatoes.

The report further reads:

"The latest official figures available show that during the month of November the cost of living in Germany, covering food, fuel, light, and rent, increased by 102.2 per cent." On November 23 the consul reports that "because of the steadiness of the exchange rate during the last two weeks it is not expected that living expenses will show such a tremendous increase for December."

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. NEWTON, do you base that increase in the cost of living on the actual value or the depreciation in the value of money?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. It is due to the exchange rate. That is what he says—the exchange rate.

The CHAIRMAN. So the intrinsic value has not gone up 100 per cent?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Well, here is exactly what he says:

"The latest official index figures available show that during the month of November the cost of living in Germany, covering food, fuel, light, and rent, increased 102.2 per cent."

That is his statement. Then follows: "Because of the steadiness of the exchange rate"—of course, they are going to have to import their food supplies, their breadstuffs, which are about to run out, and hence the exchange rate has to be taken into account—"Because of the steadiness in the exchange rate during the two weeks previous." They thought it would remain steady, but since that time I think it has gone down about 1,000 per cent.

Our American consul, on November 23, goes on to say:

"No doubt much distress prevails in Germany. The papers are full of appeals for aid for the poor and the people are urged to do everything possible to relieve the great suffering. The fuel situation remains unsatisfactory. Coal prices have had to be increased, which is due in no small measure to the fact that about 1,000,000 tons of coal have had to be imported from England each month, the exact figure for October being 918,598 tons. Fortunately for the poorer classes, the winter so far has been quite mild, making the use of coal for heating purposes practically unnecessary. Should colder weather set in, however, the suffering of the poor and middle classes would probably be very great, since the price of coal is practically beyond their reach."

Mr. GRAHAM. It would seem from that, Mr. NEWTON, that while the French are complaining that the Germans are not furnishing them all the coal they agreed to furnish, at the same time Germany is obliged to import coal in order to exist.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. That is our American consul reporting from over there that a million tons a month is being imported from England, and I have information from other sources that their importations of coal from England, even at the high exchange rates, have been practically equal each month to the amount that was taken from them into France and Belgium. Our American representative on the ground reported to the State Department that the exact amount for October was 918,000 tons.

Now, on the milk supply the consul reports:

"While imports of preserved milk were not permitted before the war, the trade has now been released from all restrictions, owing to the reduced supply of fresh milk. The last animal census shows a decline in German cattle from 18,570,000 in 1913 to 16,839,000 in December, 1921. There has been a marked decline in the condition of German cattle as well as in their number. In recent years it has been impossible to import anything like the great quantity of oil cake used before the war for the sustenance of German cattle."

On October 2 last the consul reported:

"Exact figures are not obtainable, but it is doubtful if the present supply of milk in Germany exceeds 60 per cent of what it was before the war."

I will now read the last paragraph of the report from the State Department, which is the most up to date and comes from our ambassador, Mr. Houghton:

"Under date of December 21, 1922, the American ambassador at Berlin telegraphed in part that the milk supply of Berlin is only one-half of its former quantity; that the bread consumption per capita is 104 units to-day as against 240 units in 1914; that in many parts of the city more than half of the children are tubercular and that a considerable proportion of the population there are wholly without fuel. The ambassador adds that he believes there will be great distress among the population before the middle of February, when the food supply will run short, and regards the possibilities as appalling."

Now it seems to me that with that condition prevailing over there, when we have a quantity of property far in excess of anything necessary for security, that we ought to release to the nationals as much as we can of that property, and I think we could easily release everything up to $10,000 on all the claims, because that would release the greater number of them. As I remember, the average of the claims of less than $10,000 was about $700, and we are holding 30,000 of those claims. But think what $700 will do in Germany; how many people it would feed through the winter; and it seems to me that four years after the war is over, when we take into account the fact that those nationals came here in good faith, we should restore their property at once.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. NEWTON, how much of that money due to the German nationals do you think would get over to Germany if the trusts were paid?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Well, all the little claims will go, and a good part of the big ones.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you permit an interruption for a moment?

Colonel Miller, how much of the money which might be paid out under the provisions of this bill do you think would get over to Germany? I mean immediately.

Mr. MILLER. By an arrangement which I hope we will be able to make with the embassy or the legation it is our intent to have rules and regulations ready which will permit us to move with as much speed as we possibly can, and also at the same time to prevent its being necessary for small claimants that might come in under the provisions of this bill to have to go through individual lawyers and pay excessive fees, and that was the purpose of one of the sections in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not get my inquiry. How much of the money—say it is $44,000,000—that might be paid out under the provisions of any bill—how much of that do you think would forthwith get over to Germany?

Mr. MILLER. I should think very easily half of it could before the year is out.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not mean in that way, but how much would naturally gravitate there and get back into the hands of the owner, and how much would be held by nationals who would still be in this country and would keep the money in this country?

Mr. MILLER. That is impossible to estimate, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. As an offhand guess, we will say, how much of that do you think will be paid to people who are going to get it and use it in Germany immediately for their own relief?

Mr. MILLER. I should say approximately half of it. If a claimant wanted to leave his mortgage over here and go ahead earning interest and live on the interest, of course the principal would stay here.

The CHAIRMAN. I was trying to meet the interesting point which Mr. NEWTON raised, that they were suffering there and that the release of this money would relieve that suffering; and the query is, How much of it would ever get there to accomplish that relief?

Mr. MILLER. One of the points that I have continually made is that this proposition would relieve a large part of the economic distress among a good part of the population.

The CHAIRMAN. But you have no very accurate estimate in mind as to the amount?

Mr. MILLER. I would not venture an opinion. When I say 50 per cent, that is a random guess which you have asked me to make.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. As a matter of fact, most of the smaller claimants live over there, do they not?

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. If you considered it on the number of claims instead of the amount of dollars, the percentage would be much higher, would it not?

Mr. MILLER. Very much so.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. It looks to me like a very, very high percentage of that 30,000 claims, which average $700, would go to Germany.

It was reported that the large claimants did not want their money back, but representatives of some of the big steamship companies and other big industries came to me some time ago after I had introduced a bill and made a speech on alien property, and they found I was interested, and they said this report that they did not want their property back was all wrong; that they wanted it back, but that they wanted to continue to use it here, and I think the big bulk of it, the big blocks where it goes into millions, most of that will stay here. But I think that claims up to $10,000 and probably beyond in some cases will go over to Germany.

The CHAIRMAN. One more interruption, if you please. Did you state just a moment ago, Mr. Miller, that you have made a tentative arrangement with the embassy here, the embassies and legations of these various countries to do the work, the agents for these various owners of the trusts?

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. So that it will be more expeditiously done and without material cost to the owners?

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir. And I also have in mind recommendations that I want to make to the President, if you pass this legislation, that will enable him to amend the presidential regulations and permit us to deal directly with them, rather than going through the Department of Justice.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Can not you make some provision whereby, where affidavits have to be made, as in the case of the old Cuban woman, that credit can be given to them out of their estates?

Mr. MILLER. I have that in mind, and I am also permitted to waive this consular fee that is rather excessive on small trusts.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. From the information that I have, I am confident that two-thirds of those people over there are not able to pay for the affidavits that are called for, if they must pay for them in American money.

Mr. MILLER. I am ready to act, sir, immediately after the 4th of March if you pass this legislation.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. And there ought to be some provision—for instance, in the case of this old Cuban woman, she has only $2,000. It is in preferred stocks and bonds in the Frisco Railroad down in the Middle West. She invested her little savings in them, and yet it will be impossible for her, I presume, if she is still living, to raise that $18.50 over there, and there ought to be some way so that our American consuls could take all of those affidavits, and whatever the expense is have it charged up against the estates here.

Mr. MILLER. Our arrangement, Mr. NEWTON, does not contemplate going through the American consulate. I do not want to discuss our details here, but it is the most specific plan we can make.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. But you are planning, as I understand it, to fix some way so that they can get their property without having to advance money before they get it?

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. NEWTON, am I right in thinking that the essence of your suggestion is that you approve this bill, generally speaking, as far as it goes, but you would commend to the committee's serious consideration the enlarging of its scope?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes; but I think there should be some safeguards relative to that amendment in there about the patents. I think that legislation should not be put through that could be construed to mean that Congress was attempting to validate the claims of the Chemical Foundation to these patents. The Attorney General has filed suit to set aside those sales, and I think that this legislation should be so worded that it could not be in any way construed as indicating the view of Congress as to the title to the patents.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you go so far as to suggest that the question of patents be segregated and that the other adjustments be paid independent thereof?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. If you add there a provision declaring that this law shall not be construed as in any case affecting the litigation of pending suits heretofore filed by the Attorney General against the Chemical Foundation, and in the event that suit is decided in favor of the Government, that these patents should come under the provisions of this law, then I think your bill will be all right. Otherwise I can see how it might cause complications.

The CHAIRMAN. What about other patents not comprehended in the suit against the Chemical Foundation?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I think the Government ought to treat them as trusts, and I think the patents should all be turned back.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, suppose it should appear to the committee that there were confusing conditions surrounding the patents so as to make it rather unwise to attempt to handle them just now, would you then favor the segregation of the patent proposition and go on with the rest of it?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes. I would go ahead with the other and hold the patents, but I do think that the law should be so worded that there could be no doubt—so that no one could construe your act to mean that Congress is undertaking to validate that sale to the Chemical Foundation.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, would you feel that the provision that is in here now failed to comprehend the suggestion you have made?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes. I have read that two or three times and I fear it would.

The CHAIRMAN. You think it will not apply?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I fear that the specific exception of the patents without any reservation will be construed as indicating that Congress recognizes the validity of the sale to the Chemical Foundation, but if you added to that section a provision that patents may be held in abeyance until the litigation is settled, unless Congress otherwise directs, then, I think, the act will be sound.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that was the intention of the provision. You are the first person who has raised that point.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I have read it over and I am afraid it will be misconstrued. I think the attorneys for the Chemical Foundation will contend that we specifically excluded the patents and thereby indicated that we recognized the validity of their title, and I think it ought to be clear enough so that there could not be any controversy about that point. With that correction I think the bill is good. I am certainly delighted that you are taking this matter up, and I think the conditions over there justify as speedy action as possible.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any questions to ask the witness?

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. NEWTON, the idea might be expressed by attaching to this section relative to patents language something like this: That nothing herein contained shall be construed as an expression of the final policy to be pursued in the matter of settling patents or patent rights.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Well, I think you should add, "As in no way affecting the litigation."

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes; I agree with you.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would like to ask you one question, Mr. NEWTON. Would you not think a similar provision desirable as applicable to the property which is not returned to claimant, that the question should be expressly reserved and be an open question so that there will be no implications whatever?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. If you care to do it. To my mind the confiscation of this private property to pay for the depredations of the kaiser's government is unthinkable. There are a number of ways that you could handle it. You could leave it entirely alone for future action. In my judgment that is the best thing to do; leave it entirely alone.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will say this to you: There are two schools of thought even in the committee, one holding that to return part of this property and retain the other implies that the balance will be returned in due course when adjustment or something has happened, I do not know what; the other school holds that the return of part of the property with the retention of the balance affords a logical implication that the balance is retained for the purpose of being applied to these American claims, and I was wondering why it would not be desirable to simply preclude both of those implications by disaffirming them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask you by what authority you assume to say that there are two schools in this committee?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. By the line of questions that have been asked and by private statements made to me, I may say. I do not think that anybody who has heard these hearings has any doubt that those implications diametrically opposed to each other are entertained by various members of the committee.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I will say personally that after going into the provisions of the treaty and knowing something of the investments that came over here and the circumstances under which they came, that is, that they were induced to come by our American representatives, that the holding of any of that property longer is repulsive to me. The Secretary of State may have some reason which may be justifiable for holding a part of it, but he certainly has no right to hold any more than is adequate for security.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Do you think it desirable to express in this bill that there will be no attempt of that kind?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. If you leave it silent in the bill, they can speculate on the future intent of Congress.

Mr. GRAHAM. As long as it is not stated in the bill what our policy is, any reason for withholding the present payment is a good one.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. You declare your policy now, and you don't know what the condition may be a year from now.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. May I say right on that point that it is argued because of the Knox-Porter resolution that there is already an implication that this property is to be retained for the payment of these claims and that a lien belongs to the claimants for their property, yet those things were made an express reservation.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. The trouble of it is, of course, they make their contentions and draw their conclusions as to the implication, but nobody can tell what the next Congress may do.

Mr. HAWES. I do not want to detain the committee or the witness. We have had before this committee, Mr. NEWTON, some very able lawyers who contend for a general principle what they call "the American principle," and some other very able lawyers who contend that this property should be held as security for American claims. Then there is another point of view suggested by Mr. HUDDLESTON of the release, say, of $10,000 and 50 per cent more, and some of us believe that that would set a precedent or establish a principle for the release of all of the property, and others contend that it would do just the opposite. Now, may I take your valuable time and the time of the committee just for a minute in reading the latest work on international law, written by an American, which seems to state the traditional American policy on international law, chiefly as interpreted and applied by the United States. This is by Charles Chaney Hyde. In volume 2, page 233, I find this statement—I am suggesting it because it seems to come from a disinterested source, and the book was published in 1921:

"Upon the outbreak of hostilities a belligerent may find large amounts of enemy property within its territory and remote from the field of military operations. It seems to be acknowledged that the bare existence of war does not serve in such a case to effect any change of ownership. Confiscation, whether rightfully or wrongfully, requires affirmative legislative action. According to Chief Justice Marshall the terms of the Constitution of the United States forbid the inference that a declaration of war operates by its own force to transfer title to property within the national domain. A belligerent possesses the broadest right to prevent enemy property of any kind within its territory from being so employed as to afford a benefit to the foe. While this right of prevention does not imply one also of confiscation generally, the scope of the former is such as to render otherwise unimportant the manner in which it is exercised, so long as there be no unnecessary destruction or impairment of the value of the property concerned. The procedure adopted may be designed with reference to the nature and location of the owner; thus, in case he is an alien enemy residing within the national domain and permitted there to remain without molestation, subject to good behavior, the belligerent may defer the assertion of control over his possessions until, through abuse of his privilege, he compels the State to intern him and deal with his belongings as if he were a nonresident. Prior to such event the belligerent may be disposed to deter by other means the enemy from gaining any benefit from what he owns and is permitted to retain. Where, however, the owner is the enemy itself and the property public property, or where in case of private ownership the owner is an enemy person outside the national domain and a resident of either hostile or neutral territory the belligerent may reasonably assert direct and exclusive control over the property."

That seems to indicate a distinction between the control of property of aliens residing in our country which we exercise—or, in other words, which we did not exercise—we gave them full liberty and property of the Government itself, and I find on page 237, discussing the policy of the United States, a very clear statement, which may be of interest to you:

"In the early days of the Republic a view found expression in the data of the Supreme Court of the United States, that the law of nations did not forbid the confiscation by a belligerent of enemy private property on land within the national domain. Even then there was evidence of a tendency of practice on the part of enlightened States to refrain from such conduct, for while the growth of such a practice was perceived its possible legal significance was not at first clearly understood. Somewhat later, however, it became apparent to Chief Justice Marshall that the usage of nations afforded the test of the private national conduct, and that such usage might destroy the existence of an old belligerent right. On that ground he did not hesitate to denounce as internationally illegal the act of a conqueror in confiscating private property."

That was, I believe, the Brown case. Then again on page 239 this law writer makes this statement:

"It is believed that on principle the right of confiscation should be denied a belligerent when the property is privately owned and not in fact connected with any military operation or employed for a hostile purpose, and provided seizure is not resisted. Under such circumstances the power of a belligerent to control or utilize it without interference should impose the duty, in case of appropriation, ultimately to compensate the owner."

That seems to be the undisputed American doctrine.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. That is the real American doctrine.

Mr. HAWES. That is the undisputed American doctrine.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. A custodian is a keeper of property; a trustee, whose duty it is to preserve, and to act for and on behalf of the owner thereof. He has no right to sell such property unless it be perishable, and such sale becomes necessary for the best interest of his trust. It is a source of painful regret to me that former custodians have not lived up to this standard. They have sold valuable properties, not for the purpose of conserving the trusts for which they were responsible, but for the purpose of divesting the owner of his title thereto. But regardless of what has been done in the past, it is the duty of Congress now, by appropriate legislation, to require the custodian to discharge his trust by returning all available property to its rightful owner, and where the property has been sold, if the owner thereof is not satisfied with such sale, he should be permitted to institute a suit in our courts, and the courts should be given the power either to set aside such sales or to determine upon proper evidence the reasonable value of such property. To do less, in my judgment, would be a breach of faith and a violation of our duty to the nationals who invested their money in our institutions.

Mr. MAPES. Assuming that this committee feels that this property ought to be turned back to the original owners as fully as it is possible to do, and also assuming that it feels that the Alien Property Custodian has held it as long as he ought to, bearing in mind the legislative situation and the fact that Congress adjourns on the 4th of March, what is your notion as a practical proposition the committee ought to do?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I think the committee ought to bring out a bill authorizing the custodian to return all claims up to and including $10,000 and at least 50 per cent of all remaining claims. The people in Germany and Austria are perishing from hunger and cold, and in my judgment to hold their property longer is utterly indefensible.

Mr. MAPES. Do you think the committee ought to bring out a bill recommending the return of all of it now? I am asking now as a practical matter.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Unless the State Department can give some good reason why a part of this property should be held, I think it should be returned in its entirety at once. I have heard many intimations as to the attitude of the Secretary of State, although I have heard nothing definite as to his position. I think his judgment, in matters of this kind, should be respected as far as reasonable, but I think that as much of the property as possible should be returned, and returned at once.

Mr. MAPES. As practical men we have got to determine on not only what is theoretically proper, but we have got to map out some practical procedure, keeping in mind all the legislative situations. Would you recommend that the committee report out a bill requiring the Alien Property Custodian to turn back all of this property as soon as he could?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. No; not unless the Secretary of State approves. I think, however, the State Department should give this committee all the facts from which it draws its conclusions. If the department thinks it unwise to state the facts in an open hearing, let it advise the committee in executive session. I do not think that in a matter of this character that Congress should be expected to rely entirely upon the conclusions of the State Department. I repeat what I have said before: That to me the holding of any of this property is repulsive. I feel that it is in utter conflict with the high ideals of this country in dealing with matters of this kind. I think, however, that the interest of the German claimants may be best conserved and legislation more speedily enacted if a reasonable amount of the larger trusts are held as security for American claims. As a matter of fact, I do not think that American claimants need such securities. I think the $200,000,000 worth of German ships is more than ample security for all our claims. Furthermore, after the mixed claims commission has allowed the just and valid claims, it will be easy enough to enforce the collection of such claims. Even if the German ships were released, all that this country would have to do would be to place an embargo on the importation of all German-made goods and I can assure you that the payment of all our claims would be forthcoming.

Mr. MAPES. Is it your personal view that we should hold a sufficient amount to secure the payment of American claims?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. If I were a member of the committee I do not think I would vote to totally ignore the request of the State Department. As I said awhile ago, it is repulsive to me to hold any of this property, but he may have some good reason for doing so, but certainly you ought to turn back as much as you can, after leaving any reasonable security. I think the holding of the property savors too much of the practice of holding a club to make them do what we want.

Mr. MAPES. Bearing in mind this further fact: Even assuming that the committee should take the position that you do, that it is repulsive to hold this property longer, and even assuming that no department of the Government asks the committee to hold any of it back; bearing in mind the fact, as has been stated here before the committee, that prominent Members of Congress, either in one House or the other, are opposed to doing it; keeping in mind the fact that Congress adjourns on the 4th of March, what do you recommend?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. If the State Department did not request that part of it be held, I would turn every dollar of it back. I think that unless the State Department has some good reason for holding it we ought to discharge our trust.

Mr. MAPES. That is what you would do if you had your individual way about it?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. But for the purpose of my question——

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri (interposing). You mean whether or not a bill like that would pass? Is that what you have in mind?

Mr. MAPES. As a practical proposition, what would you recommend?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I think any bill you bring into the House for the return of this property will pass. I think the danger is that the House might go too far, but I do not believe they will if you bring in a reasonable bill.

Mr. MAPES. It might pass the House, but would it pass the other side?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I think it would pass the other body. I think the opposition will fade. I do not believe they can stand before the arguments in favor of the return of this property.

Mr. Chairman, we have in this country millions of people whose loyalty during the war could not be challenged. They bought Liberty bonds and thrift stamps to the limit of their ability; they gave their sons to fight upon the battle fields of France. Thousands of people of this class live in my district, and I know their loyalty and devotion to this country. Although they had relatives living upon the other side they never faltered when the call came. They were against the kaiser and his military government, and when the President said, "We have no quarrel with the German people; we have no feeling toward them but one of sympathy and friendship; we are fighting for the freedom of all the peoples of the earth, including the people of Germany." When the President uttered these inspiring declarations the people of German ancestry in all parts of the country took him at his word. Thousands of their young men volunteered, and the casualty lists from the battle front bear unmistakable evidence of their loyalty.

And now that the war is over those people who were loyal, who fought against relatives without faltering, contributed of their substance to sustain the Government, and gave their sons to fight and die for our flag, can not understand why the Government which they fought to sustain should continue to hold the property belonging to helpless and starving relatives upon the other side, with whom our President declared we had no quarrel, but for whom we had a feeling of sympathy and friendship. They can not understand why, as American citizens, they should find it necessary to dig down into their own pockets and send money to the other side while their Government continues to hold property belonging to those same relatives. Something should be done at once. This property should be released. I believe that when the facts are presented Congress will act, and I trust that action may be taken speedily.

FUNERAL SERMON ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE MANN.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the address delivered by the Reverand Doctor Freeman at the funeral services of Mr. Mann be incorporated, in 8-point type, in the memorial RECORD of last Sunday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the address of Reverand Doctor Freeman, delivered at the funeral services of Mr. Mann, be inserted in 8-point type in the RECORD of the memorial proceedings of last Sunday. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman asking for its insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD again?

The SPEAKER. No; simply asking that it be inserted in the memorial volume.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That was the sermon delivered here, was it not?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. My impression is that that will be done anyway. I think that when they come to make up that memorial volume they will take all the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13793) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the appropriation bill for the support of the Army.

Mr. ANTHONY. And, pending that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] if I can agree with him on the time for general debate on the bill? About how much time will the gentleman require?

Mr. SISSON. I have discussed this matter with the gentleman from Kansas, and I think five hours will be sufficient, to be controlled equally on each side.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the general debate on the bill be limited to five hours, of which two hours and a half shall be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] and two hours and a half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the general debate on the bill be limited to five hours, half to be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi and half to be controlled by himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Kansas, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] will please take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the War Department appropriation bill, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13793, the War Department appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13793) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this is the bill making the appropriations for the War Department. It carries a total of $314,000,000 in round figures, of which $248,000,000 is for the military activities—that is, for the support of the Army during the next fiscal year—and $65,000,000 is for the nonmilitary activities of the War Department. The amount for the military activities, or the cost of our Army, is $12,000,000 in round numbers less than for the current year. The amount for the nonmilitary activities is $3,000,000 less than for the current year, making a total of $16,000,000 less in the bill offered to the House here to-day than was carried in the current year's appropriation bill. In comparison with the figures submitted in the Budget the amount for military purposes is $14,000,000 less than the Budget, and the amount for nonmilitary activities is $8,000,000 more than the Budget, making a net reduction in the Budget estimate of over $5,000,000.

The provisions in this bill will provide for an Army of substantially the same size as we have during the current year. We are providing for the pay of 125,000 enlisted men and 7,500 Philippine Scouts. We are appropriating sufficient money for the pay of 12,000 commissioned officers, the full number of officers now authorized by law. We are also providing for an increase in the National Guard to a maximum of 215,000 men during the next fiscal year. The guard now numbers over 160,000, will be 190,000 in size by July 1, and under the amount we are placing in this bill will grow to a maximum of 215,000 during the next fiscal year.

In this connection it is well for the House to know that the National Guard is no longer a secondary military force in this country. It has so increased in size and in efficiency in the last few years that it is no longer our second line of defense from a military standpoint, but the National Guard is now composed of trained men and organizations which will be able to take their place and efficiently perform any military duty to which soldiers may be assigned. They are first-line soldiers now, so that our active military strength has been increased in recent years substantially 100 per cent over what it was a few years ago, taking into consideration this new efficiency of the National Guard.

In addition to this active military force we have 69,000 men in the Officers' Reserve Corps, all men of military experience and qualified to perform the duties of commissioned officers in the field, should an emergency present itself. We train quotas of these men each year. This year we trained about 5,000 of them, and under the provisions of this bill we authorize the training of approximately 10,000 or more of these reserve officers during the coming summer.

In addition to this splendid military asset of officers in our reserve corps, we provide in this bill for the carrying on of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps work in the schools and colleges of the country, and the funds appropriated in this bill will provide for 110,000 of these boys being trained in the schools and colleges and Reserve Officers' Training Corps summer training camps, an increase over the present year. From this source there went into the Reserve Officers' Corps during the current year over 2,600 graduates of these schools. We are providing increased funds for the carrying on of civilian military training. We trained 22,000 in civilian military camps during the past summer, and with the increased appropriations in this bill we shall be able to train from 30,000 to 33,000 in civilian camps during the next summer.

So we consider that the committee have made ample provision for all of our essential military activities. There are no great changes made in the present establishment. We have provided equitably and in some cases liberally for all the activities recommended to us by the Budget and the War Department.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McKENZIE. On the matter of the appropriation for training reserve officers in camps there seem to be a good many protests coming from the reserve officers over the country claiming that you have not made ample provision for that purpose. Will the gentleman kindly tell us just how he came to conclude that the amount named in the bill is the correct amount?

Mr. ANTHONY. We appropriate $1,700,000 and some odd in this bill. The amount appropriated for the current year was $1,000,000. In addition thereto they had the use of about $300,000 from other items in the appropriation bill. This year the expense of training reserve officers is confined entirely to the appropriation of $1,700,000.

During the current year they trained about 4,500 to 5,000 men, and on the estimate of the basis of cost given us at $100 per man as the expense we estimate that they will be able to train in excess of 10,000 men with the money we provide in the bill. The War Department wanted to train 15,000 men. There are actually 69,000 reserve officers. The committee regarded it as unwise to undertake to train anywhere near the entire number. We made 100 per cent increase in the number to be trained. We thought that was a conservative way to approach the question.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I have had this matter up with the chairman of the committee before. I have a telegram here that is presumed to come from United States-wide interests on behalf of training asking for $5,750,000 for this purpose and stating that anything less would be a very serious deprivation. Will the gentleman make a statement about that for the benefit of myself as well as for the benefit of the House?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; I will make a statement in reply to the gentleman's question. He is voicing the result of a nation-wide propaganda for increased appropriations for this purpose. The great trouble that we had in the training camps for reserve officers during the current year was that, in my judgment, they were not all of them entirely efficient from a military standpoint. They were something new to the War Department. It was new work for them to take up, and they did not reach the maximum of efficiency. The only thing where they did reach 100 per cent was that in many of the lectures delivered by Army officers it was usual to wind up with an appeal to the reserve officers in attendance to go home and work for an increased appropriation for next year, and the gentleman is seeing the result of that propaganda.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not desirable to have these officers trained for a short time each year at the small expense which the gentleman has indicated?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is very desirable; and the committee, as I say, have made provision for an increase in the number to be trained—100 per cent more than during the present year.

Mr. DOWELL. Yes; but the number trained last year was very small. Is it not desirable to have these officers who have already had this experience take this training each year at small expense, and will we not get a better Army for much less cost than we could otherwise get?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think we had better undertake this work in a modest way, and not increase it too greatly in amount from year to year beyond the capacity of the Army to assimilate the job. I will say to the gentleman that they will have their hands full in carrying out the increased appropriations for all of the training activities this year.

Mr. DOWELL. I notice the gentleman designated this as propaganda. Is it not a fact that these officers desire the training?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not for the general good that they are asking it?

Mr. ANTHONY. There are 69,000 officers, and 17,000 only have asked for training in replying to the questionnaires of the current year, and we are providing for the training of 11,000.

Mr. DOWELL. Should not we train the whole number that are asking to be trained?

Mr. ANTHONY. I have tried to tell the gentleman that we are providing for training activities that will absorb much of the energies of the officers of the Regular Army this summer, and it would be unwise to try to train more than the Regular Army can take care of.

Mr. DOWELL. Why is the Regular Army then asking for the training of 15,000 men if they can not take care of that number?

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield to me?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Perhaps the gentleman from Kansas does not grasp the idea under which the gentleman from Iowa is laboring—that the department plans to train the officers every year. As the gentleman from Kansas well knows, it is not the plan of the War Department to train the same officers every year. It is the plan to give them a training about once in three years. We are providing in this bill a larger quota of those who have applied for training than the quota of one-third.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman is wrong about that; at this rate they would not all be trained in six years.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let me say to the gentleman, a member of the Military Affairs Committee, that it is the plan to call the men into training camps about once in every three years.

Mr. HULL. But you are not providing a fund for training them all in three years. You have 70,000 of them, and you only provide enough to train them all in 10 years.

Mr. STAFFORD. That may be so with reference to the 69,000 men on the rolls, but the hearings show that only 17,000 have expressed a willingness to have the training. This is optional with them; it is not mandatory, unless the department so orders, let me say to the Representative of the Rock Island Arsenal district. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. On the question of propaganda, my telegram is signed by the secretary of the reserve officers of Ohio.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. These officers want the training, and it seems to me we ought to give them the training that they ask for. It is my position that we ought to increase this amount and that we ought to train more officers. The gentleman from Wisconsin is mistaken when he says that we can do it in three years.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman from Iowa had about a thousand reserve officers at the camp in his town this year. Will he not be satisfied with 2,000 this next year?

Mr. DOWELL. That is not the point. [Laughter.]

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. HULL. Am I not right in saying that at the rate you provide for the training in this bill you will not train the officers that are at present in the Reserve Officers' Corps in six years?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is, taking the maximum number; but as the gentleman from Wisconsin has informed the gentleman from Iowa, there are only 17,000 out of the total number that asked for training this year, and we are giving an appropriation large enough to train about 11,000 this summer.

Mr. HULL. And you leave 60,000 without training, and there are 10,000 more at least that want training this year.

Mr. ANTHONY. There are 45,000 that have not asked for it. The War Department only trains those who ask for it.

Mr. HULL. Will an officer be of any value who is only trained two weeks once in six years?

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, when you come down to the training, I do not think that it is of any great value. I think it takes a longer period than two weeks to properly train an officer or a man, or even to refresh him.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. If I understand the gentleman correctly, we are giving an increased number for training this year?

Mr. ANTHONY. From 4,500 to 11,000.

Mr. MILLER. Has the appropriation been increased this year in proportion to the increase in the number trained?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not in proportion, perhaps; but sufficient to take care of the training, in our opinion. The figures given us by the War Department are that it cost about $100 per man. Now, you can take the maximum that is outside of the mileage and the preparation of the camps. There is over $1,000,000 available for this—$1,200,000. Divide that by $100 and you will get in excess of 10,000.

Mr. MILLER. In other words, it will not cost as much to train the officers this year as it did last year.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think it will cost as much, because they have many of the camps already prepared, and I am informed by the gentleman from Wisconsin that there is an unexpended balance of $300,000 that will be carried over.

Mr. MILLER. And that will be available this year?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Three hundred and eighty-one thousand dollars available November 30 unexpended that can be utilized for their training before June 30.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. These 10,000 officers are supposed to be already trained men?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; they are trained men. This simply brings them into camp, gives them a refresher course, and should bring them up to date.

Mr. SPEAKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. SPEAKS. There are 60,000 reserve officers, and it will cost $100 per man to train them for two weeks, a modest expenditure of about $6,000,000. The gentleman appreciates the fact, does he not, that within this 69,000——

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, it costs much more than that.

Mr. SPEAKS. The gentleman appreciates the fact that among the 69,000 officers there is an abundant number capable of conducting camps entirely outside of the Army. Does the gentleman agree with that?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; I think you can find many reserve officers capable of conducting camps, but I do not think it would be advisable to conduct camps outside of the control and instruction of the Regular Army under any circumstances.

Mr. SPEAKS. With the 160,000 National Guard maintained at an expense of about $25,000,000, and your 69,000 reserve officers, a large portion of which have served overseas and in the National Guard, have been continuously in the service for many years, and up and abreast with the Army, as the gentleman says in his report, is it not a useless procedure to continue the Army with an overhead expense of some $200,000,000, aggregating only 125,000 men, when we have 160,000 men and 69,000 officers which we can continue at an expense of about $31,000,000? Why not discontinue that whole system and at once put into operation the plan that was designed by our forefathers, and soon have an army of 500,000 men?

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman well knows that this surplus of very excellent military reserve material we have now as a result of the war will last us a few years—possibly 10 or 15 years—and that we would then have no more surplus of that kind, and we would have to depend on the Regular Army which trains its men from year to year and is the foundation of our military strength in this country. The overhead of our military machine in this country and our basis for organization has always been and always will be our Regular Army.

Mr. SPEAKS. Oh, no.

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, that is a matter of opinion. In regard to the civilian military training, as I stated before, we are appropriating $2,000,000 for that purpose in this bill. We find that about $500,000 is carried over unexpended from the current year, which we are making available for use next year. That amount will be expended in the preparation of camp sites and preliminary expense, so that there will be 31,000 civilians trained during the coming summer under the provisions of the bill.

Just a word now in regard to the commissioned strength of the Army. Congress was severely censured by the military service, by the War Department, and by a good many of the larger newspapers and magazines of the country for what they claimed was a very radical reduction it made in the strength of the commissioned personnel of the Army last year. In our bill we did reduce the number from 12,800, which was the number in June of last year, to a maximum of 12,000. I stated on the floor of the House at that time that in my opinion under the provisions of that law the War Department would be required to reduce the number of officers by not over 600 in order to bring it down to the 12,000, taking into consideration the loss from ordinary causes. What are the facts?

The facts are that in addition to the number of officers which we required should be eliminated, the War Department of its own volition has reduced the commissioned strength by over 600 below the maximum required by Congress. As a matter of fact, under the provisions of our bill, taking into account the natural losses of the commissioned personnel, it would be necessary in order to have carried out the provisions of our bill to have removed only about 375 officers. Yet, under the provisions of the law, they have taken out a total of 990 officers, and they have separated from the service by other means, largely by the use of the laws in regard to retirement, an additicnal number of 505 officers. So that about 1,400 officers in all have been separated from the service, and you have now 11,380 commissioned officers in the Army. The excuse given for this reduction below the number authorized by Congress is that they desire to make room for second lieutenants in the service. We tried to make a number of second lieutenants in the Army last year by providing for demotion, and we did largely fill up the grade of second lieutenant thereby, but I call the attention of the House to these figures to show you that the War Department evidently found that the reduction proposed by Congress was a very wise and a good thing, and they have gone 600 beyond the figure which we set for them in the legislation passed by the House to show how well they thought of it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. However, is it not just to say, in behalf of the War Department, that in carrying out the scheme, if we are to have only 12,000 officers in the Army and make it possible for the graduates from West Point coming in this year and coming in next year, and the young men that graduate from our technical schools who want to go into the Army as second lieutenants, that there should be some leeway or at least a place at the bottom to take care of them, and, therefore, for that reason they possibly went further in dismissing from the service than they would otherwise, owing to the fact that they wanted the flow coming in from the bottom?

Mr. ANTHONY. But the gentleman realizes, however, that for three or four years the War Department allowed the Army to exist with practically no second lieutenants, and they have gradually awakened to the fact that they need a few of them, but is it not a rather expensive policy to provide second lieutenants by putting 277 officers, largely in the higher ranks, on the retired list at three-quarters pay?

Mr. McKENZIE. I agree with the gentleman, but that situation was brought about by the action of Congress in reducing the number of commissioned officers.

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, no. The gentleman is entirely in error. Without making any more vacancies in the service, there was room left for the graduates from West Point under the provisions of the legislation.

Mr. STAFFORD. And will the gentleman mention the usual number that enter from West Point—260?

Mr. ANTHONY. There was room for them.

Mr. STAFFORD. And yet there are three or four hundred more vacancies for which there is no possible source of supply. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] speaks of providing for the graduations two years from now. He fails to take into account the number that will be retired because of age, which is about 250 every year.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am very glad to have called the attention of the House to what I consider the real military strength that this country now possesses in time of peace, in view of the very serious statements made to the contrary which have appeared in otherwise very truthful and reputable newspapers and magazines in this country.

It is a surprising thing to me that in newspapers like the New York Times, the New York Tribune, the Kansas City Star, and like a magazine published by the New York Times called "Current History" they will publish articles severely criticizing the Congress for reducing the number of commissioned officers "1,400," as all of these newspaper articles and magazines state, severely censuring the Congress for such action, when the total reduction in commissioned strength compelled under the legislation we enacted last year was approximately 500, and the reductions in addition thereto which have been made, wise or unwise as the case may be, have been made entirely by the War Department of its own volition. But it seems to be a popular sport to put upon the Congress the criticism or blame for conditions by these great newspapers which I feel are entirely unwarranted.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield.

Mr. McSWAIN. I will say to the gentleman I have noticed that disposition, and I wondered if the gentleman will not agree with me in attributing the tendency to the fact that those who are interested in maintaining a large officer personnel in the Army are the ones who write up these articles, having a special personal interest in it, and offer them to the magazines and newspapers, and the magazines and newspapers have only these personal views and ex parte statements furnished them, whereas, on the other hand, there is nobody having a special personal interest in circulating propaganda in the interest of "Old Man People."

Mr. ANTHONY. That is true. And I would say to the gentleman this article in Current History, to which I have just called attention, was written by an officer by the name of Myer who was one of those discharged under the provisions of the act of Congress. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. In regard to the appropriations for the improvement of waterways and harbors, I notice that the Chief of Engineers recommended an appropriation of $56,000,000, which he deemed mandatory. The Budget cut that down to $27,000,000, and the gentleman's committee has brought in beyond the Budget estimate, not the estimate by the Chief of Engineers but the difference of what apparently is a compromise of $37,000,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman from Texas has correctly stated those figures, and I intended to go into it when we reached that point in the bill. For the information of the gentleman and for the information of the House, I want to state that the subcommittee saw fit to increase the Budget estimate for rivers and harbors from $27,000,000 to $37,000,000, with the idea of making abundant and reasonable provision for river and harbor work in the country during the next fiscal year. Now, for the information of the House, I want to state, after a close examination of the state of appropriations for river and harbor work, we found there was going to be an excess of $12,000,000 carried over from this year into next year unexpended. We found the maximum of the engineers' estimate was $56,000,000 for the next fiscal year; that is, the engineer officers in the field were asked to give their estimate of what was required for next year in their different districts and reported that the maximum amount of money they would be able to expend on river and harbor work, providing they had 312 good working days next year, would be $56,000,000, and the committee appropriated 80 per cent of that amount, together with the unexpected money, and we believe it will provide amply for continuing a safe and sane policy of river and harbor improvement.

Mr. BLANTON. For every emergency proposition?

Mr. ANTHONY. It will provide for the continuation of all necessary work on every proper river and harbor activity, in my judgment.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. DENISON. In that connection, did the gentleman inquire of the Army engineers whether they would expend what they have on hand below $12,000,000 on river and harbor work?

Mr. ANTHONY. At the rate of expenditure now going on—and we are approaching the period of the year when they diminish instead of increase—we felt certain that there would be an excess of $12,000,000 unexpended.

Mr. DENISON. Yes; and the policy of the engineers always have been and is now never to reduce their balance on hand below that figure of $12,000,000, because of the possibility of an emergency; so even if they should have $12,000,000 on hand at the close of the year, they would not expend below that amount. They will stop the work before they expend it below that amount.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman is in error in that particular. The hearings last year show that the policy of the War Department is to have from three to five million dollars on hand for emergency purposes, and this appropriation that the committee recommends provides for an emergency fund——

Mr. DENISON. No; the gentleman from Wisconsin, as usual, shows he is not informed on this subject. There is no Army engineer who will make the statement——

Mr. STAFFORD. That is a nice contribution by the gentleman, because General Taylor made the statement in the hearings of last year. I will have the gentleman eat his words as to that——

Mr. DENISON. I am perfectly willing.

Mr. STAFFORD. For I will get the hearings and prove that such testimony was given.

Mr. SISSON. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I expect this will be the last time I shall appear before the House of Representatives in the capacity of a minority Representative on any of the great appropriation bills of the House. I really would like to talk to the House at some length, but my physical condition is such that I do not feel equal to the task. I shall have but little to say about this bill, except to say that the bill taken as a whole meets with my approval. We made and won the fight on the bill last year. That was a real fight. There I, along with this same subcommittee, gained the ill will of big Army people and all the people who profited by vast military expenditures and gained the affection of the unselfish, patriotic Americans. The work done by the subcommittee and the full committee this year, I think, has made a very good bill for the country, and that is saying something when I even mildly praise an Army bill, because some people do not believe I would give anything for an Army. But they are mistaken, for I would be fair with the Army, but this bill contains a great deal more than that.

We have only discussed here the military features of this bill. I hope when the rivers and harbors items are reached that certain time will be allowed so that Members of the House may have an opportunity to discuss that portion of the bill and fully express their views on that subject. I feel sure that that can be done. The time for debate to-day has seemed to some to be somewhat long in a way, but when you think it is the last regular appropriation bill upon which Members can get time you really marvel at the moderation of Members in asking for time.

But, my colleagues, I want especially to take advantage of this opportunity to express my very deep appreciation of the very keen friendship between myself and, so far as I know, every Member of the House of Representatives. [Applause.] I have been here for 14 years, and the sweetest service I have rendered has been the service within the last few months, because the most gratifying hours of a man's life are those in which he knows that his friends appreciate him.

During my service I have had a good many tilts with Members on the floor, especially with my Republican colleagues. I recollect very well a thing which Andrew Jackson is alleged to have said, after, as a young man, he issued his first challenge to fight a duel. A very much older lawyer than he had rasped him considerably and made young Andrew very mad. Andrew thought the elder lawyer had taken advantage of his youth in making fun of his knowledge of law, and that it was done to humiliate him, that being his first lawsuit. So Andrew very promptly challenged him to fight a duel, and they went out and took a shot at each other, but both missed. Before they were ready for the second shot their friends intervened and convinced them that they were acting the fool. Andrew shook hands with the old lawyer after the old man apologized by saying, "I never intended to wound your feelings." They had a good time on the way back, and Andrew Jackson said then, "I made up my mind and swore to myself that I would never challenge a man to fight a duel for anything that was said in the courtroom, in open court, or in any legislative proceeding, either of the State or Nation, because," he said, "when spoken in such a place it usually is not done to insult, and if it was, it will afterwards develop and then it can be attended to."

I have thought of it many times since I read it when I was a boy. I take it that that ought to be true not only with men in the courtroom but in the House of Representatives. A controversy arises, and men who are strong, their minds virile, say many things on the spur of the moment in the heat of debate which a moment afterwards they wish they had not said. But I do not know but that sometimes even sharp conflicts between strong and fair minds make better friends of us than if we had never had occasion to differ and take each other's measure.

But I want to say that as to the men with whom I have been associated here, in my judgment they have been as honest, as scrupulously honest, as any set of men it has ever been my good pleasure to associate with. I have been associated with but two men here, neither one of whom is now in Congress, of whom I have had the least suspicion as to their honesty and integrity. First and last I suppose I have been associated with more than a thousand men here. I do not believe that in the church, I do not believe that among physicians or among lawyers, you will find 435 men gathered together in one building and engaged in one undertaking where you will find as many honest, courageous, square, high-toned, elegant gentlemen as you will find in the House of Representatives. [Applause.] In saying that I am saying it when it will do me the least amount of good, inasmuch as I am going out. I tell you we have got to be of that sort, boys, because if we are not the people at home would destroy us; because, as it is now, the Congress of the United States is "the goat" for everything that is wrong. If anything goes wrong, they do not charge it up to the President, except very mildly, but they do charge it up to the Congress.

I think a great mistake is being made in the country; I do not believe that the people should lose confidence in the integrity of the House of Representatives or the legislative bodies of the Government. In other words, as long as the people have confidence in the Congress I think the Republic is very much safer. I think it makes for revolution, it makes for discontent, when the people throughout the country question the honesty and integrity of Members of Congress.

But let me tell you, gentlemen, that when a man goes through a party primary with severe opposition, and then goes through a general election, if they do not find out what he has done, then they have been negligent in that district. [Laughter.] You have heard the story of the gentleman who ran for sheriff, a very splendid man, who conducted his campaign hopefully for a week, and then came in and said to his friends, "I am going to get out of this race." "What is the matter?" they asked him. He answered, "They accuse me of stealing a mule." "You did not steal a mule, did you?" "Of course I did not." "Go ahead, then," they said. Thereupon he resumed his activities and ran on for about a week more, and then came back and said, "I am going to get out of this race right now." His friends asked him, "What is the matter?" His answer was, "They not only accuse me of stealing a mule but they are going to prove it on me right away if I do not get out." [Laughter.]

When they get to charging a candidate with every crime on earth a man is bound to be a pretty good one in order to come safely through many campaigns. So, after being in public life for quite a while, I have changed my entire mental attitude toward the membership of the House. They are not dishonest. They can not be bought.

A criticism, however, might be offered, which, I think, is a just one. But no man, I think, can truthfully charge the Members of this House with being dishonest. I believe that of the 435 Members of Congress there is hardly a one that would not smash your nose if you went and offered him a thousand dollars for his vote; and he ought to do it. I believe all the Members of this House are honest, but I tell you one thing: All the Members of the House are not as politically courageous as they ought to be. The trouble is we are afraid of the people back home. Here is another thing, and that is the weakness in us all; sometimes I do not know whether it is a weakness or not. Here are our friends, who have been so loyal and true to us. They have kept us in office, and when some issue comes up they are unanimous in wanting us to do something for them, and we are prone sometimes to yield to that influence. Gentlement of the House. I believe that is the greatest weakness of the Members of Congress.

I used to wonder sometimes why it is that so many Members of Congress after their defeat like to stay in Washington. I believe I know now. When you go to college and mingle with your mates there for four years you say those ties are very, very close, and they are. They are made when our minds are impressionable, when we are young; the ties are close, but youth forgets quickly and takes on new friends; so I do not know of any association that is closer than the association here in this House. My friend JOE BYRNS and I came here 14 years ago. There has never been a relationship in my life or in his where the associations have been any closer or more intimate; and when you think that that has extended over a period of 14 years, when will he or I in our future lives ever associate with men so closely for so long a period again? Even though I live to be threescore years and ten, I will not associate with any other men as intimately and as closely as I have associated with these gentlemen here. I think it was Champ Clark who called attention to the fact that within the last 14 years we have served each term of 24 months, about 22 months out of every 24, together here in Washington. That is to say, we have practically served the 14 years together. Some of these men were here when I came. Many of those who were here when I came have gone; but as I look over the House to-day I see the faces of many men who were here before I came or who came here with me. Some of them have been here many years. Now, it does not matter how long I may live or where I may be cast upon this earth's strand, there will never be men for whom I will feel closer friendship, there will never be men for whom I will have a higher regard or a deeper affection than for the men with whom I have served in Congress. [Applause.] And, so far as I know, I do not believe there is a Member of Congress who is not my friend. [Applause.]

I am going to make another confession. When I came here I was just as terrific a Democrat as I am now, but I am less of a terrific partisan than I was when I came here. I believe in the principles of Democracy as firmly as I did when I entered the door of the House for the first time, but I have found that men's friendship is not divided by that middle aisle; and thank God it is not. I do not know of a gentleman for whom I have a higher or a tenderer regard than I have for Uncle JOE CANNON, of Illinois. [Applause.] We all love him. I have been intimately associated with him on the committee. He is a great benediction to all of us. And may I say—it may be the last time I shall have the opportunity to pay this tribute to him—Uncle JOE CANNON is one of the few very great men whom I have ever known. [Applause.] He is a great man. When the history of the Speakerships of this House is written, Uncle JOE CANNON is going to stand out in bold relief as one of the Mount Pelions in the range of Speakers. In fact, it has been my good fortune to serve under two unique Speakers, Uncle JOE and the inimitable Champ Clark. I do not know of two men who were so much alike and yet so totally different as Champ Clark and Uncle JOE CANNON. They were both, as we might say, diamonds in the rough. Their rugged, honest souls caused them to be loved and respected, not only by their colleagues here but by the people of the Nation. When I mention Uncle JOE, I can not refrain from mentioning another great and much beloved man on the Democratic side of the aisle. He was born in the same State with Uncle JOE. Uncle JOE left; he remained in the State of their birth—that of North Carolina. I refer, of course, to most-beloved Member of the House, Maj. CHARLES M. STEDMAN, the Confederate soldier, now a Member of the House. There is not a Member of the House on either side who does not love, admire, and respect him, nor is there one who would not with pleasure render him a service. [Applause.]

My friends, I said that the center aisle does not divide our friendship. It does not. Take the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. MADDEN. I have differed with him greatly. He has made some speeches here that I wish he had not made; but I have associated with him not only since he has been chairman of the committee but in many ways before, and I want to say for him now—the history of it is going to be written some day—this new reform, this new régime, has put upon him an extraordinary burden; that he has more than made good.

Those of you who have not been in close touch with this committee are not altogether familiar with the difficulties he has encountered. In the first place, these subcommittees had to be reorganized along new lines, and he had to deal with strong men, and they are hard to please. The House was torn asunder with conflicting elements and conflicting forces. I want to say of Mr. MADDEN, the chairman of this committee, that in my judgment he has made a magnificent job of it and is entitled to the thanks not only of the House but of the country, I do not care whether you are Republican or Democrat. [Applause.] He has demonstrated his capacity to do big things and do them well.

Now, I should like to mention the names of all these boys I love so well, but I can not do it. I can not mention them all. I see them around me. If they should happen to come to my town, I would never forgive them if they did not come to see me. I see my friend PAIGE, of Massachusetts, who buys cotton down in my country. If he should come to my town and not come to see me I would never forgive him in the world. I would haunt him all the days of his life. In serving on these committees, in dealing with the affairs of this great country, we learn to know each other very well. If I had not been on this Committee on Military Affairs, one of the choicest spirits in this House would not have come so completely into my soul. I could say good things about all these boys, but I want to tell you that I would never have known and been so intimately friendly with DAN ANTHONY as I am if I had not served on this committee. [Applause.] I hardly know exactly what term to use to tell you how good he is, but there is not enough shadow in DAN ANTHONY'S soul to hide one sinister thought. [Applause.] If DAN ANTHONY were a Democrat, I would vote for him for President. [Laughter and applause.]

Then there is my friend STAFFORD—bless his heart. STAFFORD has gone in and out. Going out of Congress is a new and strange experience to me, but it is not new to you, STAFFORD. [Laughter.] STAFFORD has the capacity of coming back. [Applause.] He has demonstrated that repeatedly. No man ever served on a committee who was more faithful or who labored more zealously or more earnestly than my friend STAFFORD. [Applause.] He is not afraid of work. He is not afraid of opposition. He is not afraid of defeat, because he has demonstrated that in the House repeatedly as well as back in his district. [Applause.] That is the kind of man it takes to make good.

Much as I would love to talk about all these other folks here, I have got to tell you something about JOE BYRNS, because JOE BYRNS is the only man I ever was jealous of in this House. He is the only man that stood between me and the chairmanship of the Committee on Appropriations if the Democrats had got the House. I want to tell you how JOE got that. Mississippi did not have a member of the Ways and Means Committee. Tennessee did. There are several of us who came in at the same time and went on the committee together. Cordell Hull was on the Ways and Means Committee, and he put JOE BYRNS ahead of me. That is what happened. They tell me it was decided by drawing straws. But JOE had Cordell to fix the straws. [Laughter.] If I had had a member of the committee, it might have been different. I want JOE BYRNS'S district to keep him in Congress until he is chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, because, Mr. MADDEN, I believe that JOE BYRNS will make a great chairman of that committee.

Mr. MADDEN. He certainly would.

Mr. SISSON. Because he has not only had training under a good many good Members, but I want to say that he has had a magnificent example in you, Mr. MADDEN. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say to the gentleman that no one has a higher appreciation of his services or yours, and I think he would make not only a good chairman of the Appropriations Committee but a good President of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Now, Mr. BYRNS, you see how you stand and how high I have had you promoted, and you must walk circumspectly, uprightly, and with dignity henceforth. [Laughter.] Gentlemen of the House, I am not going to weary you much longer. There are men, however, in the House I must mention. I have been here with them so long. I do not believe there is a man in the House who has more real good friends than has FINIS GARRETT, all of whom appreciate his honesty, integrity, and ability. [Applause.] I do not know just what to say about him, except to say that he is not only honest but he is courageous. He is willing, when his convictions stand in the way, to take his political life in his hands and follow his convictions. [Applause.] I think FINIS GARRETT is one man I know that has absolutely voted his convictions on every measure. [Applause.]

I must not close without referring to one of the most distinguished and able Members of the House, who is absent on account of illness but one who is always in the minds and hearts of all of the Members of the House, our distinguished Democratic leader, CLAUDE KITCHIN. [Applause.] We all rejoice that the news is so good, and we all hope in a few days to see his strong face again. The country needs his strong right arm in its defense against its enemies. In conclusion, permit me to say of the delegation from my own State that each Member is my friend, and I love them all. They are all a fine and able body of Democrats, each having close to his heart not only the interests of his State but that of the whole people. God bless my Mississippi colleagues. I love you all. [Applause.]

Gentlemen of the House, I hope you will pardon me for this expression of my regard for the House. So far as the financial end of the matter is concerned, I have no regret in leaving. I do, however, have great regret in severing the ties of friendship that now exist between myself and this body of magnificent and good men, the closest in the world. Those of you who feel this sincere friendship and who have served here 14 years, when the time comes to sever these relations it is going to be hard. That is why men love to hang around Washington after defeat, because they do not like to leave these Halls and leave the Members they love so well. So, my brethren, I want to take advantage of this opportunity to say that I love every one of you, because you are worthy of being loved. I respect every one of you, because you are worthy of respect, and I hope that the standard of the House of Representatives will always be as high as it is now; that whatever may be the mistakes made the country is not going to suffer as long as it has men of this type and men of this character looking after the interests of the Government of the United States here in this House. You have the Ark of the Covenant of our liberties—the Constitution. Keep it safe. Guard it with your lives. When you do, our American liberty will always be safe. I thank you, my friends, for your attention, and again beg pardon for taking up so much of your time. [Applause. Members rising.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the lady from Illinois [Mrs. HUCK].

UNIVERSAL PEACE AMONG THE NATIONS OF THE WORLD.

Mrs. HUCK. Mr. Chairman, representing as I do a State which is also represented by 26 Congressmen of unusual ability, I feel that it is my privilege to bring here and present as nearly as possible the woman's point of view in regard to legislation. If what I have to say seems to be too conservative in some parts and in other parts a bit radical, I will ask you to be tolerant of my ideas until you understand them not as conservatism or as radicalism, but as something approaching as near as possible the woman's point of view, a point of view that gradually is becoming as important a factor in our Government as the viewpoint of the farmer or the banker. And when I have put my ideas before you I hope you will compliment them with the same scrutiny and unbiased consideration that you give to the views of any Member.

I do not mean by this to put women in a class as distinct from others. We are fully aware of our oneness with the people as a whole—in fact, I believe that it is through our understanding of this oneness with all classes that it will be the women who will bring with dignity the much-needed harmony between men and most especially between their governments.

Women often take different mental routes from men, but arrive at their legislative conclusion a large majority of the times. There is one difference, however, that must be considered—we, as women, differ with men as to what we believe to be the more important issues before our country—and as we have often come to the man's conclusion in regard to what he believes to be the important issues, so I believe there are many men who will look upon the woman's conclusions in regard to her interests as fair and logical.

We are irrevocably opposed to war and never intend to rest until universal peace is forever established among the nations of the world. We are anxious for a more general equality between men and women; that marriage shall not take away the woman's right to choose her own citizenship; that married women shall not be discriminated against in the economic world; and that the mother shall have in all States an equal right with the father in the care, custody, and control of the child. It is the woman who is doing the best work in connection with the child-labor amendment and other welfare work. We want a universal marriage and divorce law of the right sort. We want more dignity and refinement in our local governments. This last, however, is more a matter of education than legislation, but it is the woman's desire. These are important to the women, and although we recognize the importance and the absolute necessity of appropriation and tariff bills we feel that these other issues are equally important and should not be put off year after year.

I will not go further into these subjects at this time, for it is my desire to speak more especially of but one phase of the woman's interest—that is, world peace. World harmony is a subject of such magnitude that I shall not even attempt to enumerate the many angles from which this most important goal must be approached. I am here to speak of but one of these angles—not that I believe this to be the most important angle from which to approach universal peace, or that an approach from this angle will insure world peace, but because to me it is the most logical preliminary step to take.

At the beginning of the nineteenth century there were only two Republics in the world—the United States and Switzerland. They represented less than 2 per cent of the people in the world and occupied about 2 per cent of the land. Their system of governmental activities was so beneficent and heartening to the subjects of the monarchial form of government that the spread of democracy has been astonishing and is recognized as the greatest of all events in history tending toward human betterment and the amelioration of the condition of the people.

To-day, after the lapse of less than a century and a quarter, 80 per cent of the people of the world—if we consider the British Empire as a democracy, which it is in fact but not in theory—are self-governing. Even China, "the sleeping child of the Orient," quite recently threw off the yoke of the empire and now belongs to the sisterhood of Republics. It is altogether evident that in a country where the people control their government there is no opportunity for a war to originate. To support this statement it is only necessary to refer to the fact that there is no instance since the formation of our Republic where a republic has provoked a war or coveted the lands of another people.

The centralization of power in the hands of one man, or a small group of men, has been the proximate cause of many, perhaps all, of the wars of recent history. This is well illustrated by the fact that if Germany had been a republic instead of under the autocratic rule of the kaiser there would have been no World War, and the white race now would not be stricken morally, mentally, and financially in a way that it will take a century for normal conditions again to prevail.

All people agree that wars result in useless waste of life and treasure, and that the killing of men and the destruction of property is bound to be visited by Divine displeasure. Therefore I have introduced a resolution authorizing and directing the President to inform nations of the world that the United States will delegate to its people the sole and exclusive control over war with any nation or nations which delegates a like power to its people.

It may not be amiss in passing to remark that if such an agreement had been in existence between France and Germany both the German and French people would have voted against war.

I think it is safe to say that the majority of the people, especially among the self-governing countries, believe that the most vital of all things to them is the question of war, and that this should be decided by them and by them alone, but many are reluctant for the United States to take such an unprecedented step and thereby perhaps put itself at a great disadvantage in the time of a crisis, unless other nations agree to suffer a like disadvantage. This objection is met in the resolution; it is not to be effective except with nations that adopt the same policy.

I have carefully provided against a vote in any nation by an extremely limited electorate by allowing that nation, I think, very fairly, to select the election laws of any State in the Union fixing the qualifications of the electors and the manner of conducting the election.

The provision requiring the certification of the vote within 60 days is to prevent any willful delay on the part of any nation in announcing the result, and the prohibition against any hostile act within a year after an affirmative vote is for the purpose of giving the nations which believe that they have suffered some wrong from another a "cooling time" as provided in many of our treaties with foreign countries, and further for the purpose of preventing preparations for war during the time the election is being held. There is very little, if any, difference between a war between two nations and a street fight between two men; in both instances the parties lose their heads and a war or fight results. If time were allowed for them to cool off, it is likely the fight or war would not occur. At least, in my estimation, a provision of this kind is worthy of a place in any resolution which has world peace as its goal.

War between this country and another republic is impossible at this stage of our civilization, and in drafting this resolution I seriously had considered the advisability of emphasizing that point by notifying only the monarchies of this offer and concentrating our efforts in their direction; but because republics by virtue of their governmental experience will be quicker to understand and take advantage of such an offer and because the concurrence of any great nation with us in this matter will encourage other nations to take the step, I have included all nations with a population great enough to warrant a constitutional change on our part in order to live up to our agreement with them.

If time would permit, I would bring out the facts which substantiate my belief that now is the psychological time to press this matter of a war referendum, and that we, in view of our financial and moral position, are the psychological leaders in this movement for world betterment.

If it is my honor to be returned to Washington this spring to represent the second congressional district of Illinois, I will take up this resolution in the next Congress, and continue my fight for this war referendum from the floor of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding the gentleman from Mississippi will use some of his time.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, the Members of this House are accustomed to receive so many knocks that it gives me pleasure to say that in a service of 22 years I have not known a more faithful Member of this body than the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], who will not be a Member of the next Congress. He has been so faithful and so industrious that I think it can be said without undue praise that his retirement from this body is a national loss. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I arose to submit some remarks about a matter that has been discussed on a former occasion on this floor.

The presence of the British mission in this country at this time is assurance that Great Britain intends to pay the $4,200,000,000 and interest which Great Britain owes to the United States for money advanced during the great World War. The history of Great Britain proves that she is jealous of her reputation in respect to the payment of her obligations. The people of this Nation may now feel reasonably sure that this great debt of the British people to America will in course of time be paid in full. For my part, I would favor giving to the British people very liberal terms with one condition—that no part of the principal of the debt be canceled. I would favor giving to the American commissioners now engaged in negotiations with the British commissioners power to distribute the debt over a long period of years and to agree to a very low rate of interest. I would go as far as I reasonably could to satisfy the conditions of the British commissioners, reserving always the condition that no part of the debt should be canceled. Under this arrangement the people of America and the people of the world would feel reasonably sure that the British debt had been adjusted; that in course of time America would get every dollar of the money advanced to Great Britain during the World War.

I rose to-day for the purpose of making a suggestion to the majority side of this Chamber. You profess great love for the ex-service men. On Armistice Day you deliver patriotic speeches, praise the ex-service men to the skies, shed tears over the misfortunes of the wounded, and deliver eulogies over the dead. It seems to me the arrangement which is now in process of consummation removes the only obstacle which President Harding suggested to the payment of adjusted compensation to the World War veterans. President Harding declared himself in favor, in principle, of the adjusted compensation bill, but declared that the insuperable obstacle in the way of the measure was the failure of Congress to provide means for raising the money. With more than four billions of British bonds, every one of them worth eventually par, this obstacle ought to be considered removed.

The bonds would probably bring a fair price upon the market even if not indorsed by America. Certainly they would bring 100 cents on the dollar if America should indorse the more than four billions of bonds or any part of the four billions. It may be difficult to work out, but I confess I can not see where the difficulty lies in an arrangement whereby America would indorse enough of the British bonds to provide for the payment of adjusted compensation to the World War veterans. I have had my doubts at times whether some on the majority side of this Chamber were really enthusiastic about this question. Perhaps I have had the wrong impression. If I have had the wrong impression, there are others, many of them, who feel just as I do. However this may be, the presence of the British commissioners here and the determination of Great Britain to pay this debt gives to the Republican Party, now in control, opportunity to prove your faith by your works. You can remove the discrimination in respect to the treatment of our World War veterans as compared to the treatment that the World War veterans of other nations have received since the armistice was agreed to. Great Britain has done more for her World War veterans than we have done; Canada has given to every World War veteran approximately $600; New Zealand, Australia, have done more than we have. Even France has done what we have not done. Italy in her poverty has dealt more generously with her ex-service men. I wonder if we, the richest nation of all, are willing that this situation shall continue. Other nations have perhaps taken part of the very money we loaned them to satisfy their ex-service men. America alone of all the nations associated against the Central Powers has done nothing for her ex-service men. Of course, I do not refer to the wounded. During the last Congress each of the Members of this body received a letter from one of our colleagues which told a tragic tale. We received a circular letter from one of our colleagues from the State of New York in which he declared that the necessities of the ex-service men for the coming winter were so great they would be glad, many of them, to receive our cast-off clothing.

I think he represented an organization known as the "Lest We Forget" organization. This colleague of ours invited us, in fact he urged us, to send all of our cast-off clothing to a certain address in this city, assuring us there were many ex-service men—men who saved the civilization of the world—who would be glad to wear our old clothes.

In the newspapers of yesterday I read an account of the arrest of an ex-service man who had received many decorations who, in his dire necessity, had taken an old secondhand overcoat. Of course, he was discharged, as he should have been, after he explained the circumstances in which he found himself placed. More than that, this man to whom I refer was one of the many shell-shock victims. Now, gentlemen of the majority side, I am perfectly serious. I would scorn to play politics about a question which is near to my heart and which I consider most sacred. I stand here ready to help you pass the measure I have suggested before the 4th of March next. I would not introduce such a measure myself, because I know it would stand no chance of becoming a law. I would not wish to see any Democrat introduce such a measure. I do suggest that my young Republican friend from South Dakota, ROYAL JOHNSON, who walked out of this Chamber to enlist as a private, and returned as a captain, wounded almost to the death, as well as other ex-service men on both sides of this Chamber, take charge of this matter and press it to final passage before the gavel falls on the 4th of March. I am a member of the Rules Committee. I promise you my vote as a member of that committee. I think I am safe in saying that every Democratic member of the Rules Committee feels about this matter just as I do. I will go further and say that I believe almost the solid minority on the Democratic side of the Chamber would enthusiastically support such a measure even if introduced by a Republican. You may have the glory, if that is what you are striving for, but let us not permit the 4th of March to come without removing this discrimination under which the American ex-service men live. Let us quit talking about how much we love them and how ready we are to shed tears while their Representatives on this floor are willing to beg for old clothing in order to keep warm during the rigors of the winter the young men who saved the civilization of the world from destruction.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, this bill—the Army appropriations—together with the naval bill, appropriates over $600,000,000 for national defense. Of this amount over $100,000,000 will undoubtedly be paid to private industries engaged in the manufacture of munitions of war. In other words, we are appropriating in these two national defense bills over $100,000,000 that will go to foster industries that promote war.

I appreciate the fact that it is impractical to cut out all military expenditures, or perhaps even to reduce them to any great extent. But certainly it is the duty of Congress to examine these estimates of expenditure with the most scrupulous care and endeavor to effect savings which will in no way impair real preparedness or curtail the effectiveness of our Military Establishment. To evidence that money paid to private industries is worse than wasted, permit me to quote a commission reporting to the League of Nations:

Six objections to the untrammeled private manufacture of the means of waging war were listed in a commission report to the League of Nations, September 15, 1921. They are weighty. Think about them.

1. That armament firms have been active in fomenting war scares and in persuading their own countries to adopt warlike policies and to increase their armaments.

2. That armament firms have attempted to bribe Government officials, both at home and abroad.

3. That armament firms have disseminated false reports concerning the military and naval programs of various countries, in order to stimulate armament expenditure.

4. That armament firms have sought to influence public opinion through the control of newspapers in their own and foreign countries.

5. That armament firms have organized international armament rings through which the armament race has been accentuated by playing off one country against another.

6. That armament firms have organized international armament trusts which have increased the price of armaments sold to governments.

The avarice of private industries engaged in the manufacture of war munitions does not permit a willing relinquishment of the huge profits derived from such manufacture. If one was permitted to prepare this country in a scientific, industrial way, I am sure that it could be better prepared with an expenditure of $300,000,000 than it will be with the expenditure of $600,000,000, as provided for in these two bills. As long as private industries are permitted to dictate the policies of the ordnance departments of the Army and Navy there will be no real preparedness. It is four years since the close of the World War, and it is time the people of this country applied the lessons of that war. One great lesson taught the American people at that time was that subsidized private industries were not prepared to furnish supplies to the Army and the Navy. The money we gave them was worse than wasted. They led us to believe that we were prepared, but when the time came we had practically nothing to fight the war with. We had given the Ordnance Department untold millions; they had the greatest facilities in the world, and they had taken our money and given it to private industries. Private industries had nothing on hand. We fought the war with borrowed material and paid billions of dollars for materials that were never used. Scientific industrial preparedness consists in having everything used in warfare made and perfected in small quantities, sufficient to demonstrate usefulness. After perfection the tools, jigs, and dies necessary to produce the article in large quantities should be made and kept constantly available. Plans for their allocation throughout the country should be ready always, so as to permit immediate quantity production should the need arise. With a system like this it would not be necessary to be constantly buying large quantities of articles that become obsolete within a very short time.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Has this country at the present time machinery and equipment with which to manufacture its own munitions?

Mr. HULL. It certainly has at the present time, publicly owned. There is not any question about it, and it has had for the last 20 years facilities to make everything we need in war, and make them better and cheaper than we can get them otherwise.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. And how much of a saving does the gentleman think we would make annually if we manufactured our own munitions?

Mr. HULL. I estimate that if you would adopt a scientific, efficient system of manufacturing not only the munitions of war but also all the supplies that the Government needs, you would have at least $100,000,000 every year; but that is not the most important part of the program. The important thing that I have in mind is that if you would adopt this kind of system you would be ready for war, and that is something that you are not when you adopt the idea of subsidizing private industries. You are never ready.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I have not paid as close attention to what the gentleman has said as perhaps I should, and I do not know whether he has mentioned the subject or not; but it is true, however, that Congress for a number of years made appropriations suggested by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] to enable the Ordnance Department to secure jigs, dies, and master gauges, to be placed in the hands of the independent, private manufacturers, so that in case of war they could immediately begin to produce. Is it not a fact that up until the time of the war they had not spent any of that money, and it is not the private manufacturers' fault in that respect? That was due to the negligence of the Ordnance Department up to that time. Is not that true?

Mr. HULL. The gentleman is absolutely right. They were depending, however, on private industries to furnish these jigs and tools, and when the time came they found they did not have anything on hand. There is the entire trouble. We gave them $5,000,000 to manufacture rifles, and they have two of the greatest factories in the world manufacturing the best rifles in the world, one at Springfield, Mass., and the other at Rock Island, and they took that money and bought pistols with it, and our boys fought with an inferior rifle.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not a fact that, according to the testimony before the Committee on Military Affairs, we do now have the jigs, the dies, and master gauges stored away, held for a future time, to be handed over to private manufacturers in case of necessity?

Mr. HULL. In some cases that is true, but in other cases it is not true. It is not the fault of Congress, because Congress has time after time indicated what it wanted done with the money given to the Ordnance Department. It is due to the administration of the law by the Ordnance Department, both of the Army and of the Navy, and the Army is more guilty than the Navy.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Do I understand that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], as well as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE], are in perfect accord, that the War Department has been guilty of neglect?

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not know that I get the gentleman's question.

Mr. GARNER. I understood the gentleman from Illinois a moment ago to ask the gentleman from Iowa if it was not the fault of the Ordnance Department and if it had not been negligent. I merely ask the gentlemen if they are both in accord that the War Department has been negligent?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will state to the gentleman that for the past two years the War Department has been very active in looking after these things, but that prior to that time there was some neglect.

Mr. GARNER. I thought the gentleman would want to modify his statement. I know that when the balance of the House contend that the War Department does not function as it should, the gentleman from Illinois is the first one to rush in here to the defense of the action of the War Department, and I did not think that he would want the record to indicate that he had charged the War Department with being guilty of neglect.

Mr. HULL. I do not know that I can answer for the gentleman from Illinois, but I myself have voiced the idea that the Ordnance Department of the Army has failed, utterly failed for the last 10 or 15 years, to prepare this country for war. Congress was not to blame.

We gave them the money. We told them how to do it as plainly as we could. It was the administration of the law by the Ordnance Department that was at fault.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. I will.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he is in favor of having the Government furnish the necessary jigs, dies, and other tools to private individuals and still rely upon them to furnish munitions in time of need?

Mr. HULL. No; not peace times, but to make them so that they can go out and commandeer private industry in war time and produce them within 30 days. It is easily worked out if they will go to work at the present time or in peace time. There is no use in trying to stop profiteering in war time when you can not stop it in peace time, and in these two bills you are not trying to stop it. Why, I had a provision in the Army bill—and I would like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee—for the last five years, a provision directing the Army, the Ordnance Department, the Quartermaster Department, that when they wanted an article and they could manufacture it cheaper than they could buy it that they should manufacture it, but I find in this bill you have stricken out that provision. I do not know why. Perhaps the chairman could tell us. Is there any reason why that provision was left out of the bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. The committee thought they had a very good reason for leaving it out. They thought the necessity for it had passed at this time.

Mr. HULL. But you left in another part of the bill a provision by which the Ordnance Department can go out and pay 25 per cent more than it cost to manufacture an article.

I feel it is high time to endeavor to check this menace of future wars. Last session I introduced a bill, H. R. 10967, which would go far toward doing so, besides saving the taxpayers of this country at least $100,000,000 a year, while also improving our general preparedness. This measure is designed to improve the efficiency of our arsenals and navy yards.

It is not generally recognized what an important and admirable series of manufacturing plants the Government possesses in its 13 naval and 11 Army establishments. The people's investment in these industrial facilities is conservatively estimated at $350,000,000. They are equipped with the most modern type of a great variety of machinery and tools, such as are contained in the best manufacturing plants which aim to turn out a large list of products. Their routine work for Army and Navy requirements covers many lines of basic manufacture, such as steel production, foundry operation, machine production, wood-products manufacture, clothing production, paint and varnish production, and so forth. The articles which these plants turn out include not merely the ordinary munitions of war, such as guns, ammunition, explosives, and battleships, but hundreds of items useful as well in civilian and peaceful pursuits, such as ships and boats of all kinds, engines, locomotives, autotrucks, lighthouse equipment, electrical equipment, chemicals, optical instruments, clothing, and so forth. Their systems of work embody the highest practice of engineering standards. Their personnel consists of at least 40,000 mechanics, many of them among the most highly skilled in the country, all American citizens, all competitively chosen and employed under the civil-service regulations.

It is unfortunate that we must still be in a condition to meet the sudden menace of war; but, admitting this necessity, every citizen has a right to be proud of the extent and the high industrial character of the Government plants maintained as the basis of preparedness. That pride would be without a regret or a flaw if plants of this character could be used to manufacture not instruments of destruction but articles contributing solely to the national peace and prosperity.

The world-wide desire for disarmament has already made progress, and we all hope that it will make much more progress in the future and that it may eventually render establishments to manufacture implements of warfare entirely unnecessary. Unfortunately, however, that ultimate goal still seems a long way from realization. We have started to scrap ships; we have reduced active forces; we are not building at an accelerated rate. All this achievement is to be commended. But we have not yet reached the stage where it is safe to scrap the means for making ships and munitions of war. That stage will be the last one on the long road to final disarmament. We must keep our plants; we must maintain our arsenals and navy yards in such a condition that in an emergency they may turn full production into military requirements. The plants, the equipment, the trained personnel must be maintained simply as a measure of military insurance, whether they are busy or whether they are idle. There is no serious proposal at present to do away with them, or even to make any great reduction in their capacity.

We have then a situation in which a vast and well-equipped plant capacity must be maintained, though for the time being there is little or no demand for the product which it was constructed to produce. The overhead involved in maintenance goes on just the same, and is paid by the taxpayers, even if a large part of the capacity is idle. It costs the taxpayers several million dollars a year to maintain these establishments, even if not a wheel turns in one of them.

Where can we find the orders with which to keep the arsenals and navy yards busy? Not in the channels of private trade. But there are many supplies currently needed by the various Government departments and agencies, including the War and Navy Departments themselves, which could be made in these governmental establishments, but are now bought from private contractors. This placing of private orders goes on while the Government plants are operating at a very much reduced pace. Now, if anyone should argue that a business man ought to allow an expensive plant to remain idle, without making efforts to keep it busy, it would be absurd enough. But if in addition the plea should be made that while doing this he should send orders to outside contractors for products which his idle plant could make, the answer is that only a madman would do so. Yet that is the kind of business man Uncle Sam now seems to be. So ridiculous is a policy of this sort that it is necessary to examine the situation more in detail to see if the Government of the United States really can be guilty of this folly without some good reason that does not appear on the surface.

A very careful and full engineering survey by O. S. Beyer, jr., a competent consulting engineer, has been made of the capacities of the Government plants and of the civilian requirements of the Government departments which might be manufactured there. It is noteworthy that this survey has not been controverted in any important point by the opponents of the bill. It establishes the fact of the adequacy of the equipment of arsenals and navy yards to manufacture a very wide range of supplies ordered by Government departments.

Besides additional material for the War and Navy Departments themselves, the orders of other governmental agencies which might be executed in arsenals and navy yards include a long list of articles, such as trucks, knives, shears, canceling machines, carriers' satchels, letter boxes, letter-box posts, and so forth, for the Post Office Department; air compressors, automobiles, boats, cars, carts, concrete mixers, excavators, graders, locomotives, motor cycles, plows, pumps, derricks, dredges, electric motors, engines, scrapers, wagons, and so forth, for the Interior Department; lightships, paint, and so forth, for the Department of Commerce; instruments, chemicals, fire-fighting supplies, road-building equipment, motor trucks, and so forth, for the Department of Agriculture; coin machinery, dies, tools, steel safes, revenue cutters, and so forth, for the Treasury Department; ship repair and reconditioning work for the Shipping Board; a wide variety of miscellaneous supplies for the District of Columbia; hospital and other supplies for the Veterans' Bureau; equipment for the Government Printing Office; equipment and supplies for various special projects, such as canals, irrigation and reclamation projects. The estimated expenditure for 1923 on such products is $300,000,000. This total includes only those items which the arsenals and navy yards are well equipped to produce, and still leaves a vast sum for outside purchases.

Now, with 40,000 employees the arsenals and navy yards turned out in 1921 about $112,000,000 worth of orders. They had 102,000 employees in 1918, at the peak of production, or two and a half times as many as in 1921. Therefore, they could turn out at 1921 prices and with a full complement of men about twice and a half as much as they did turn out in 1921, or about $275,000,000 worth of work. Their actual production in 1919 amounted to about $210,000,000. There is therefore no doubt that the plants have the capacity to handle the greater part of the work enumerated above.

All this time there has been, I have no doubt, a question in the minds of my hearers on the cost of these products if made in Government plants compared with the cost in private plants. It is the habit of those with a stake in private ownership and operation to charge that governmental operation is wasteful and expensive. Even though the Government saved on overhead by keeping its plants busy, might it not lose through higher cost of production?

Let me silence this question at once by saying that it is not proposed in this bill to give any work to Government plants which could be done cheaper outside. The bill provides merely for competitive estimates, the job to be awarded to the Government if its estimate be the lowest. Surely there could be no better recognized or more businesslike practice than this.

An investigation of the plants themselves and of the work already secured by them through competitive bids shows that interested propaganda is mistaken in this case at least if it charges that governmental manufacture is less efficient and more costly than private manufacture. A survey of waste in industry, conducted by a committee of the Federated Engineering Societies, under the chairmanship of Secretary Hoover, made an evaluation of efficiency in private metal plants and found them on the basis of the standard set up 71.5 per cent efficient. Exactly the same standard was applied to the arsenals in the survey conducted by Mr. Beyer and they were found to rank as 81.3 per cent efficient. The navy yards were 84.8 per cent efficient. Thus, according to engineering standards, the Government plants are superior to private plants.

The proof of the efficiency is in the cost. The total prices on arsenal jobs of which competing private bids are known for the two years ended in May, 1921, was $407,097.05. The nearest competing prices submitted for the same jobs by private plants was $540,390.05. Thus a saving of $133,293 was effected on these jobs by governmental production, a saving of about one-third. Surely this evidence is substantial enough to convince anyone.

The actual costs were in many cases considerably below even the estimates given by the Government plants. A record of orders received through the arsenal orders section during the first eight months of its career shows that in 12 jobs the estimate exceeded the cost and that in only two the cost exceeded the estimate, the net saving under the estimate on these jobs being a very large percentage of the total charges made. Thus, even if the Government plants had been in business for profit, they would have made a substantial profit on the low estimates which they submitted in competition with private bidders.

So obvious are the savings to be made by awarding Government work to Government plants through competition that the former Director of the Bureau of the Budget, Charles G. Dawes, ordered on November 9, 1921, that the War Department should be given an opportunity to bid on all supplies needed by other departments. (Circular No. 46.)

The case is so plain and the order of Director Dawes is so explicit that the question naturally arises why any legislation is needed, especially since the arsenal orders section was created with the express purpose of building up this type of production. Congress itself has recognized the principle of doing as much Government work as possible in Government plants by clauses in appropriation bills. This bill introduces no new principle, no startling innovation. It merely aims to further a well-founded and authorized policy by removing certain obstructions, which seem trifling in the law, but which offer considerable resistance in practice.

There is, in the first place, the inertia and conservatism of bureaucratic officials, a characteristic with which Congress is only too familiar. The passage of this bill will be in great measure and educative process, an unmistakable expression of the will of the people, which will help to wear down such purely obstructive measures as prevented the arsenal orders section from realizing its full opportunities. Such measures are exemplified by the statement of the Chief of Ordnance in his annual report that "estimates are submitted on such articles as can be economically produced with available equipment, which is not altered or rearranged in any way which would interfere with its immediate use for military purposes." The possibility for "immediate" use in military manufacture is one that doubtless appeals to the trained Army bureaucrat, but it is carrying technical preparedness a bit too far. After all, we shall not find ourselves in a situation where the arsenals must be turned into full military production without more than a 24-hour warning. Even if we should, it would be a far greater handicap to find our efficient working force dissipated through lack of work than to have a few machines in a condition requiring a few days' or even weeks' rearrangement in order to produce munitions.

Another obstacle is directly traceable to lack of legislation. In our system of making appropriations we make no provision for meeting first costs necessary to enable arsenals and navy yards to enter upon new lines of manufacture. These first costs are not large in most instances; they consist of jigs, tools, and so forth; but if charged up to the first lot of goods manufactured, they might raise the estimate to a prohibitive figure, even though more than a compensating saving might be made on future orders. There is some doubt as well whether the department placing the order would have the legal right to devote any part of its appropriation to meeting this initial investment.

The arsenals and navy yards themselves can not build up any fund under existing law to meet such contingencies, for if they make a profit on any given job it must be immediately covered into the Treasury Department. The lack of what would correspond to a profit and loss fund in a private establishment also raises other difficulties. The Government plants can not make "firm bids," because if the work should cost more than the estimate they would have no reserve with which to meet the loss. They can not secure options on materials necessary for manufacturing goods on bids which have not yet been awarded and thus take advantage of the primary markets.

Another difficulty is the frequent limitation of appropriations to the end of the fiscal year, which forces work out of Government plants when it is only partly finished because the availability of the appropriation ceases in the middle of the job.

It will be seen and admitted by any fair-minded person that these difficulties, obstructive as they are, have to do only with minor technical matters and that their removal could only be in the interest of efficiency. No opposition to their removal could possibly be as weighty as the arguments for the main policy, which their removal would facilitate.

The bill provides, first, that all military supplies and equipment shall be manufactured in Government plants, at least in time of peace. This at one blow removes the dangers of a hand-fed private munitions lobby. The bill provides, second, that the Government plants must submit estimates on all supplies needed by Government agencies which they are fitted to make, and that wherever the Government estimate is the lowest the Government shall receive the award. This assurance of competitive bids among the Government establishments as well as between the Government on one side and private contractors on the other is pure common sense.

The third section of the bill provides that Government plants may retain any profit they may make through producing less than the estimate, such funds to be applied to meeting possible losses on firm bids, or in any of the various ways shown as necessary above. The fourth section of the bill creates an estimating bureau to coordinate and push the work. The last section of this bill provides that appropriations applied to the purchase of goods made in Government plants shall remain available until the job is finished, as they do in the case of orders placed with private plants.

I do not see how there can be any sincere or valid objection to any of the above clauses of the bill.

Section 5 of the bill makes a provision which in my opinion is equally desirable, though it is somewhat more difficult to understand. This provides that overhead charges necessary for maintaining Government plants in a condition of military preparedness, and not arising from the work done on specific Government orders, shall not be charged against those orders. The soundness of this provision is established as follows: The overhead incidental to military preparedness must be borne by the taxpayer, whether the plants are idle or not. If, as a result of charging this overhead to individual jobs done for civilian Government departments the estimates should be so high as to send work to private firms, the taxpayers would have to pay the private overhead and profit as well. There would be an extra burden on the taxpayers as a result. It is, therefore, to the interest of the taxpayers not to include this portion of the overhead in the estimates. It should be borne in mind, however, that the savings which, as I have shown, have been made on work actually done by arsenals and navy yards were charged on the existing basis of overhead, not with overhead reduced in accordance with this provision. This provision would render more savings to the taxpayers than before.

One important result of the bill I have touched upon only lightly. It was suggested by the organizations of labor representing the mechanics employed in Government plants for the sake of stabilizing their employment and keeping the forces together. This would not only be an advantage from the point of view of human standards, but an advantage from the point of view of efficiency. By enlisting the active good will and cooperation of this highly skilled and intelligent body of men, production costs could further be reduced, and the waste of labor turnover and the training of new men in times of increased production could be minimized. It is noteworthy, I think, that while almost all other classes and factions are making appeals in their own behalf which would put burdens on the National Treasury, labor makes an appeal which would save the taxpayers at least $100,000,000 a year.

When the bill was first introduced, I could see opposition to this plan from only two groups: One is composed of those constitutionally unable to favor anything new; the other is composed of leeches who want no interference with their opportunity to suck juicy profits from Government extravagance. After postponement of the hearings for several months to allow the opponents of the bill to prepare their case, we have heard flimsy opposition from people who might rudely be classified as certain departmental bureaucrats, the attorney of the National Association of Manufacturers, and private contractors for the Government. Their objections fall into two mutually contradictory categories: First, that the bill is not necesssary for carrying out the prescribed policy; second, that the prescribed policy is unwise.

The bureaucrats object that one department might benefit by savings effected on work for another department; that the authorities and prerogatives of certain Cabinet officials might be interfered with; that the Government plants might be diverted from their primary war-making purpose; that it is desirable to place "educational" orders with private firms. One wonders how much such orders might "educate" such firms to an expectation of large profits from making war supplies. Such trifling objections need no answer to men of plain sense.

The representative of the Association of Manufacturers does not furnish a valid answer to a single one of the major arguments advanced in behalf of the bill. His objection he characterized as "fundamental" in that the bill would place the Government in competition with its citizens, a policy which he said was contrary to our theory of government.

I doubt very much whether the majority of the conservative manufacturers of this country as taxpayers would oppose a measure which would save them $100,000,000 a year on account of any such vague, theoretical consideration, if the issue were properly presented to them. No class is more eager for tax reductions than the manufacturers. None is more avid in seeking special favors from the Treasury. Yet in substance their attorney says that he wishes to keep artificial obstacles in the path of the efficiency of Government plants, and so not to allow them to compete for Government orders in a fair and open field, to compete with the comparatively few plants who would profit by governmental extravagance. I believe in prosecuting the profiteers of the recent war, but I think it would be a much surer and saner plan to stop profiteering in the peacetime needs of the War Department, and thereby better prepare our country and make profiteering in time of war only remotely possible. If we would stop war we should remove the great incentive for war.

Mr. SISSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO].

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, I find it strange indeed that so many who are liberal in the consideration of appropriations for railroads, on the ground that transportation is vital to the development and business of the country, are always stingy when it comes to appropriating for good roads and waterways, which are two of the big links in transportation. For instance, when Government control of the railroads was legislated back to private control these men were liberal in making provision for their operation. A few days ago when a bill was reported to the House by the Appropriations Committee it was discovered that they had not even provided for the work on the roads that had been contracted for and was about finished in the different States of the Union. It was only after an aggressive fight that we succeeded in getting the necessary appropriation to aid the States in their good-road building program.

To-day we begin the consideration of the bill which carries an appropriation for waterways. And what do we find. We find that while the Appropriations Committee has gone a little above the estimate of the Director of the Budget—which, I suppose, is to chloroform us—they have gone much under the estimate of the Board of Engineers, whose main function is to study and improve navigation. Again, those of us who believe that transportation is vital to the country and that transportation means not only the building of railroads but good roads and waterways as well will have to make a fight for an increased appropriation for our waterways. Certainly anyone who has given any thought to the subject of transportation must understand that the producers of this country, and especially the farmers, can not continue to do business unless we have better facilities for shipping and marketing and lower freight rates. While we can do a great deal by legislation, it should be plain to anyone who studies this problem that permanent relief can only come from the improvement and use of good roads and waterways in connection with railroads. Providence has given us the most magnificent system of waterways in the world and we have done practically nothing to develop them.

Let me say to those who want to practice economy that there are two kinds of economy—true and false economy. Appropriating money without a policy for roads and waterways is false economy. Appropriating money for roads and waterways under a policy that looks to the completion of the work is true economy. The people of this country are always liberal in appropriating money for important projects, and what they are demanding of their representatives is that the money be spent in a businesslike way, so that in the end they will get value received for their money. In conclusion, I want to appeal to this House to consider our system of transportation in a comprehensive way and to adopt a policy that will mean the improvement of railways, good roads, and waterways. With the adoption of a policy of this kind the United States will finally have adequate transportation facilities and the products from our farms, forests, mines, and factories can move from the places of production to where they are manufactured and back to where they are consumed at reasonable rates.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JEFFERS].

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting in 8-point type a statement from the American Committee of the Interallied Veterans' Federation, addressed to the President of the United States, protesting against the proposed release from prison of certain men who struck at our Nation in the hour of peril. This is a statement that each Member of the House should, I believe, have opportunity of reading.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting in the RECORD a certain statement in 8-point type, to which he has referred. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The statement is as follows:

The following protest against release of so-called political prisoners was presented to President Harding to-day by H. Nelson Jackson, of Burlington, Vt., vice president of the Interallied Veterans' Federation, and R. E. Condon, of New York, member of the National Executive Committee of the American Legion and Executive Council of Interallied Veterans' Federation:

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

MR. PRESIDENT: We, the American Committee of the Interallied Veterans' Federation, whose membership of 15,000,000, embracing the American Legion and the veterans of eight nations, wish to protest against that sentiment which calls for the release of so-called political prisoners.

We address ourselves to you, Mr. President, because you are the recipient of the pleas and protestations of those people who desire that our penitentiaries be freed of certain men who struck at our Nation in the hour of peril. They say that these men merely stood for the right of free speech and should not be punished for that. But Americans who have not forgotten the war, nor the crippled and the dead and the widows and orphans.

know that free speech is not the issue involved but the right of a free people to protect themselves against treacherous attacks from within. These attacks were an effort to undermine our established form of government, which all true and loyal Americans were unstintingly giving themselves and, if necessary, their all to defend. Such actions against our Government, whose existence has contributed so immeasurably to world peace, was a fundamental attack on all liberty-loving people.

The forces of international radicalism and anti-Americanism want these so-called political prisoners released. We who fought for true democracy and real freedom want them kept where they deserve to be—in prison.

H. NELSON JACKSON.
R. E. CONDON.

JANUARY 12, 1923.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4260. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge over the Columbia River, between the States of Oregon and Washington, at a point approximately 5 miles upstream from Dalles City, Wasco County, in the State of Oregon.

The message also announced that the Senate had concurred in the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 251) providing for the filling of two vacancies that will occur on January 14, 1923, and March 1, 1923, respectively, in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress. The amendments were, on page 1, line 3, to strike out "two vacancies" and insert "vacancy"; on page 1, lines 7 and 8, to strike out "of John B. Henderson" and insert "that Frederick A. Delano"; on page 1, lines 8 and 9, to strike out "whose term will expire March 1, 1923," and insert "be appointed to succeed John B. Henderson, deceased"; and to amend the title so as to read "Joint resolution providing for the filling of two vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress."

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 13481) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MCNARY, Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. LENROOT, Mr. SMITH, and Mr. OVERMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution and the Vice President had appointed Mr. JONES of New Mexico, Mr. BURSUM, Mr. LODGE, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. CURTIS as the committee on the part of the Senate under the second resolution:

Senate Resolution 406.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Hon. NESTOR MONTOYA, late a Representative from the State of New Mexico.

Resolved, That a committee of six Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the Senate do now adjourn.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 4131. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Sioux City, Iowa, and to Union County, in the State of South Dakota, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Big Sioux River at a point 2½ miles north of the mouth of said river, between section 14, township 89, range 48, Woodbury County, Iowa, and section 15, township 89, range 48, Union County, S. Dak.; and

S. 4133. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of North Dakota and the State of Minnesota, the county of Pembina, N. Dak., and the county of Kittson, Minn., or any one of them, to construct a bridge across the Red River of the North at or near the city of Pembina, N. Dak.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I shall not expect to speak at any great length on the subject I would discuss, but shall extend in the RECORD in full what will be a fair explanation of my position on taxation of undivided profits and an answer to the National City Bank's January circular. At this time I desire to say that the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] just offered finds a warm response in the hearts of all Members on both sides of the aisle. He is right when he says that this aisle does not separate friends, and he is right when he says that Members of this House are honest in their convictions. We all know that very large bodies of men and interests are formed for the purpose of putting legislation through Congress. They are not always fair with Congress or with Members individually. They strike hard sometimes. We sit here in an effort to do what is right, legislatively, as judges. In our committees we get the viewpoint of people on all sides who come before us and we ought to be well informed. I believe the average Member is disinterested and acts so far as he can for the public interest. I hold in my hand a little pamphlet gotten out by the largest bank in the country possibly, the National City Bank of New York, which contains a number of pages answering an argument recently made by me on the floor and using my name a dozen times, and also the names of Senators and others. I have no personal objection to the criticisms, because they are mildly expressed, but we are obliged in our efforts on the floor to answer statements if they are wrong, and I desire to present the answer briefly. The Government to-day owes $23,000,000,000 and more. The Government to-day is at an expense of $3,000,000,000 and more in carrying on its annual work. That money must be produced in some way. Congress adopted what we supposed was the best plan imaginable when we took the income-tax principle during the war and embodied it into law to meet these heavy expenditures. The Secretary of the Treasury now informs us that $10,000,000,000 we supposed would be a source of profit for the Treasury in income taxes, are now wiped out through tax-free securities. Over $2,000,000,000 in stock dividends have been just declared. That action takes that enormous amount of money away from personal income taxes, so the surtax, which had been depended upon by Congress to raise this money, has been lost to the Treasury.

I desire to discuss the National City Bank position, will be glad to do so, not only now but in the future, its policies, its profits of 25 per cent last year, and the angle it pursues generally in criticizing public men who here seek to do what they think is right for their constituents and for the public. I have no private interest. I have no prejudice against wealth. Organized wealth is entitled to its rights, and we all recognize that, but when men dodge taxes, as the Secretary of the Treasury so well says, by putting $10,000,000,000 in tax-free securities, that loss has got to be met somewhere. How? The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] a few moments ago said that we ought to give to the soldiers their compensation and pay from English foreign debts to this country.

I have been in favor of that proposition from the outset, but I have suggested another means and a remedy, because I recognize the difficulties involved, and I know the opposition that will come from any effort to collect taxes that should be collected; I have embraced within the terms of the soldiers' compensation bill, recently introduced, a proposed retroactive tax on undistributed profits, a tax that is graduated, and also propose the reenactment of an excess-profits tax.

We have been told that the moment we put such a tax in force the industries of the country will lose the money that is necessary for their use.

Mr. Chairman, you may read in yesterday's papers a half page advertisement in practically all of them which asks the country to subscribe $50,000,000, for what? For Cuba. It is signed by the National City Bank; by Kuhn, Loeb & Co.; and by J. P. Morgan & Co. to send $50,000,000 to Cuba to be taken from our industries at 5½ per cent or 5.55. A tremendous amount of money to be invested abroad as well as in this country that our people are asked to subscribe with liberal commissions to the banks handling the deal. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], the man who will be chairman of the Ways and Means Committee next session, sits before me. We are trying to do what we can to aid Congress to reach a solution of this tax question. I am doing so in a very humble capacity, I am free to confess, but I believe there is a doubt in the mind of the average man that we should tax undistributed profits. That conviction is general, and that opinion is recorded by some of the ablest judges of the Supreme Court of the United States in their dissenting opinions on the stock-dividend case.

Every effort must be brought to bear on both sides of the aisle next session if we are to bring about curative tax legislation, because interests that are opposed will be just as strong in the future as they have been in the past. They will protest against every cure. They are looking for every weakness in the laws we pass—naturally so—and Congress, which is supposed to be unprejudiced—and I believe Members of Congress as a rule are unprejudiced—should bring every effort to bear to solve this tax problem next session.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The people largely have to depend upon the Secretary of our Treasury Department for suggestions as to needed legislation to prevent tax dodging. As long as we have at the head of that institution a man who is as much interested as any other multimillionaire in tax dodging, how may we expect any relief along that line?

Mr. FREAR. I will say to the gentleman, if he has reference to my correspondence awhile ago about the 25 per cent penalties which have not been enforced, that I am seeking to reach that delinquent penalty in part by additional taxes on undistributed profits, so that neither the Secretary nor anyone else can have uncertainty as to the law; we propose to collect this tax if possible and to make it retroactive.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; certainly, to the committee chairman.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think my friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is hardly fair. The Secretary of the Treasury has indorsed several propositions intended to prevent tax dodging, among which is the constitutional amendment to prevent the issue of tax-exempt securities and other measures that will be introduced later on.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GARNER. What seems the strangest thing to me that has ever come up in my legislative life is that the very men who are dodging taxes, those referred to by the gentleman from Iowa throughout the country, including the Secretary of the Treasury, and also including the National City Bank and the Exchange National Bank of New York, and all the other rich men who are utilizing these securities that he speaks of, claim to be in favor of this action. I do not understand it. It is not in accordance with human nature.

Mr. FREAR. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa to answer, if he desires, why the proposal to abolish tax-free securities has the support of interests named.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not know why the gentleman from Texas makes that statement. The men to whom he refers have their money invested in active business enterprises which have to compete with these tax-exempt securities. That is one reason; and another reason is that almost everybody else throughout the country is in favor of that amendment to prevent the issuance of tax-exempt securities because it is founded on the natural law of right and justice.

Mr. GARNER. If these men, including Mr. Mellon, the Secretary of the Treasury, and these other financiers to whom the gentleman has referred, have not all got their money invested in tax-exempt securities, I would like to know who has their money. They all seem to be anxious to be relieved from this threat that they are saying now is made to keep them from being taxed. I say that is not in accordance with human nature.

Mr. FREAR. I will yield again to the gentleman from Iowa to answer that if he so desires.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has seemed very desirous that this threat should not be carried into effect and that these securities should not be taxed, and a very able speech was made in favor of tax-exempt securities by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM]. While I would have hardly expected them to be in accord, I do not impugn the motives of either.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. I believe that no unbiased citizen of the United States who has followed carefully the recent correspondence between the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] and the Secretary of the Treasury can escape the conclusion that we can not expect any adequate relief from tax dodging in the way of recommendations from the Treasury Department.

Mr. FREAR. I thank the gentleman from Texas. I did not know that my efforts had met with such approval. They did not from the Treasury Department, although I feel confident the penalties should have been imposed as a matter of law. I can understand the Treasury Department may find loopholes, if desired, in the law as it stands to-day. I believe, however, my bill, recently introduced, can collect that tax on undistributed profits, but it will require the joint action of both sides of the aisle constituting this Congress when the matter comes before us next session, and I hope that will occur. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, in a December pamphlet the National City Bank of New York, through its vice president, Mr. Roberts, enlightened Congress with the statement that "wealth employed in industry is social wealth no matter who owns it." Pursuant to its announced task of educating the people of the country on this subject of "social wealth" that ought not to be taxed, the same bank in a January pamphlet just received devotes several pages to the subject, and as chief cyclops of the big business bloc it criticizes Senators and Representatives by name who fraternize with the "farm bloc."

A great financial institution like this bank has a beautiful theory in economics that finds hungry appetites throughout the world should be appeased when visualizing a corpulent, full-stomached man whose anatomy has absorbed all food within reach. The bank, much like Mark Twain's Colonel Sellers, frankly wonders why the multitude is not filled with food by simply gazing on the rotund figure of a well-fed gormand.

On December 20 a modest effort was made to set forth what seemed to me to be the public's viewpoint of the subject of "social wealth," and I desire briefly to offer additional observations to make more clear the position of the average legislator compared with selfish interests that naturally do not want to pay taxes.

SOCIAL WEALTH DOES NOT PAY PERSONAL DEBTS.

To use the National City Bank's December statement for a concise text I quote from its circular sent to Congress:

> Wealth employed in industry is social wealth no matter who owns it. The soviet revolutionists of Russia had a theory that leadership counted for nothing. * * * The clamor for increased taxation of wealth is largely by people who favor it as a means of distributing the accumulation of wealth that exists. * * * The country will not be safe from such proposals until the fundamental fallacy that runs all through them is understood.

The "soviet" references were repeated in the January circular received with personal reflections.

A beautiful theory urged by the bank is that "social wealth" held by the few is owned by the public, and in response I suggested on December 20 that—

> The accumulation by one man in a lifetime through Standard Oil manipulations of wealth reaching, according to estimates, over $2,000,000,000 on an original capital of a sixpence is thus "social wealth no matter who owns it."

Theoretically it may be true he can not bury it or carry it off to some other planet, and therefore it figures in the total wealth of the country, but the average taxpayer finds little solace in that theory. Again I ask if the millions of thin, gaunt, hungry mortals who find life a grind and struggle, even in this prosperous country, will be comforted and stimulated through observing the well-rounded stomach of an overfed gormand who believes that all food is "social food" no matter whose stomach it fills?

The simile is lost in comparative appetites, because Rockefeller's $2,000,000,000 may be hoarded away, given to charity, or placed in business where the public will continue to contribute 10, 20, or even 75 per cent per annum of "social wealth," like the New Jersey subsidiary, to the one who holds the purse strings and the profits.

In my remarks before the House on December 20 I referred to the National City Bank officers and their policy not by way of criticism personally but to disclose the viewpoint of the bank's officers when seeking to teach Congress and the country through pamphlets and other propaganda placed on our desks why wealth should avoid taxes now provided by law. In the pamphlet for January, issued by the National City Bank, a statement from the viewpoint of the bank is entitled to consideration.

The statement complains that I misquoted or misconstrued Secretary Mellon's forceful letter to Congress protesting against further issuance of free-tax securities because he found over $10,000,000,000 of what the bank terms "social wealth" has been placed where it avoids taxation. The statement from Secretary Mellon to Congress came from a great financier who estimated that of possibly $30,000,000,000 in tax-free securities now floating around the country $10,000,000,000 or more are held by those who invested to dodge the income tax law. No other reasonable interpretation can be placed on his appeal to Congress to prohibit the issuance of tax-free securities through a constitutional amendment to that end.

DOES TAX DODGING EXIST? IF SO, BY WHOM?

As between Secretary Mellon and Vice President Roberts, of the National City Bank, Congress will accept the judgment of Mr. Mellon, who knows the facts. His statement is also supported by Jules Bache, a Wall Street broker, who may not be entirely wrong when stating that the average big business man now spends 11 months of the year seeking how he can legally avoid his taxes.

Mr. Roberts may remove a well-grounded suspicion in the minds of the public that a large part of the wealth of big business men to-day finds investment in tax-free securities, by stating facts within his own knowledge rather than by arguing against the merits of the Mellon proposition.

Secretary Mellon may be wrong on the 25 per cent penalty clause he has failed to enforce on corporation surpluses, but he and Bache are believed not far wrong on tax dodging, even though it may hurt the tender sensibilities of high financiers to have it so termed. The fact that income-tax returns on incomes of over $300,000 showed a decrease of from 1,296 in 1916 to 395 in 1920, or nearly 70 per cent loss, shows how rapidly tax dodging has become popular in New York's business circles and how Bache's disclosure is fulfilled by official figures.

THE TRUE BASIS OF PROFITS.

Standard Oil's net earnings of $775,000,000 in 10 years, or 77½ per cent annually (New Jersey subsidiary), is ingenuously reduced in the National City Bank article, by basing profits on the capitalization and enormous surpluses that recently went into stock dividends. Whether Mr. Rockefeller had 11 shares or 100 shares in 1912, 10 years ago, every share of stock, if retained, according to the company's report, returned 77½ per cent annually for 10 years, even when based on an inflated stock dividend capitalization of 1912. No sophistry can change those facts or figures.

$37,400 WAS PAID BY THE PUBLIC FOR EVERY $100 INVESTED.

The Senate oil investigation discloses that a $100 investment in Standard Oil stock (Indiana) before the dissolution increased by stock dividends of 2,900 per cent in 1912 is now worth $37,200 apart from large cash dividends paid throughout the period. The public paid the profiteering price, yet any demands for an adequate tax causes the National City Bank to cry "Sovietism." Undivided profits invested in business the bank insists must be bomb proof. Just taxes according to the purpose of the income-tax sixteenth amendment and acts of Congress should reach the surplus whether held in cash or invested in tax-free securities, oil pipe lines, or otherwise. A tax based on ability to pay graduated to 50 per cent personal surtax is now avoided by undistributed profits and tax-free securities so that Standard Oil and other trusts may extort from the public 37,400 per cent profits apart from generous cash dividends distributed. And the National City Bank complains of the "farm bloc."

Mr. Chairman, I will not split hairs over the basis of figuring beyond observing that a celebrated witness once said some equally celebrated things about "figures that lie," and so forth. What more preposterous economic situation can be presented than that shown by Standard Oil in Senate committee hearings? It fixes prices on oil for the country without any relation to production, reasonable profits, or any other matter ordinarily affecting trade. On its own showing one subsidiary company made $775,000,000 in net profits during the past 10 years, of which amount above taxes $220,000,000, or 22 per cent, annually was distributed among its fortunate stockholders and $400,000,000, or 40 per cent, additional annual average net profits are now laid away in cash or in increased investments or in development of oil fields from California to Mesopotamia or in some other form. When income taxes are assessed on its $400,000,000 stock dividends it responds that five Justices of the Supreme Court have held its profits when put in stock dividends are not taxable. In the other Standard Oil case the profits apart from cash dividends are said by the Senate committee to reach $37,200 on an investment of $100.

WHAT GOOD JUDGES SAY OF THAT DECISION.

To the stock dividend decision made in violation of the spirit of the sixteenth constitutional amendment, four justices dissented with two memorable statements. The first says:

The known purpose of this (sixteenth) amendment was to get rid of nice questions as to what might be direct taxes, and I can not doubt that most people not lawyers would suppose when they voted for it that they put the question like the present at rest. I am of the opinion that the amendment (sixteenth) justifies the tax.

Is not that statement of the judges unanswerable?

What answer, I submit, will stand against this second proposition quoted from the dissenting opinion of other judges in the same decision, who say:

If stock dividends representing profits are held exempt from taxation under the sixteenth amendment, the owners of the most successful businesses in America will be able to escape taxation on a large part of what is actually their income. So far as their profits are represented by stock received as dividends they will pay these taxes not upon their income but upon the income of their income. That such result was intended by the people of the United States when adopting the sixteenth amendment is inconceivable. Our sole duty is to ascertain their interest as therein expressed.

The National City Bank's protest against taxation through fear of "sovietism" did not affect four judges of the Supreme Court, who would have taxed stock dividends, but were outweighed by one vote in the decision of the court.

NATIONAL CITY BANK'S 25 PER CENT PROFITS.

Another case may be understood by Vice President Roberts. On January 9—last week—President Mitchell, of the National City Bank, according to the press, stated the net profits of that bank for 1922 were $9,708,894.74, from which amount dividends of 16 per cent were declared and paid in cash to stockholders; the balance, in undivided profits set aside as surplus, was $3,308,894.74. This latter amount will not pay any personal income tax because not distributed. The bank has an interest, a large interest, in the tax. In other words, $6,400,000, or 16 per cent, was distributed to the stockholders of the National City Bank for 1922 and $3,308,894.74 has been laid aside for investment, thus avoiding personal taxes, making net earnings for 1922 of about 25 per cent for the bank on a capital that may have been augmented and built up, so far as the public knows, largely by the same methods pursued by Standard Oil.

The 25 per cent net profit annually is only about one-third the rate of net profits annually collected from the people by Standard Oil, based on its capitalization, but even 25 per cent net profits seem rather large to the man who finds many laws throughout the country that prevent his notes from drawing over 7 per cent annually, without subjecting him to criminal prosecution. I do not question the legality of the bank's profits, but it is able to distribute 16 per cent to its stockholders and lay aside over 8 per cent that will pay no personal tax. The man who loans his "social wealth" at 7 per cent annually finds himself a penny piker when consulting his profit sheet compared to those who hold the country's "social wealth" as self-constituted custodians for the public.

THE TAX PROBLEM FACING THE COUNTRY.

Let us face the real problem squarely without evasion of either taxes or argument as briefly alluded to at the outset.

The Government owes $23,000,000,000 or more that must be paid, together with running expenses of the Government that are three times pre-war expenditures, reaching over $3,000,000,000 annually. Who will pay it? Certainly not the 100,000 farmers whose farms were sold for taxes in 1922. Certainly not the millions of unemployed, reaching 5,000,000 workers in 1921. If not these, then who will pay the bill? Legislators are interested in raising the funds from different sources, basing the tax on ability to pay.

Secretary Mellon has disclosed to the country where many billions of dollars in tax-free securities have been availed of to evade taxes by the holders of great wealth. These evasions or Treasury losses were not anticipated when the law was passed by Congress, and such losses or failures to meet estimated governmental expenses must be met.

Again, big business incorporates because of advantages thus given to it by law. It is now discovered that great corporations are furnishing a new avenue for tax dodging and consequent Treasury losses by distributing over $2,000,000,000 in stock dividends not subject to personal taxes but taken from the corporate undistributed profits. The following statements are illuminating:

Mr. Chairman, the query arises, Why should not the following stock dividends, less than one-half the total, all pay a tax on the undistributed profits that were used to create the stock dividends?

A FEW PERTINENT QUESTIONS.

With a great tax problem facing the country we find enormous and unexpected tax dodging and revenue losses reported by the Treasury on the part of those best able to pay. The average taxpayer asks:

Has any other government given to corporations equal rights and privileges? Does any other government report equal corporate business compared with its total business? Does any other government report equal corporate profits compared with total business capital invested?

Does any other government permit its corporations to escape personal taxation through stock dividends?

Does any other government permit tax-free securities?

Does not England, our largest business competitor, have far heavier taxes than ours?

Should not wealth pay taxes according to its ability?

Is not this an elementary tax principle with every government?

Has private wealth accumulations in any other country approached our own?

Are like tax-escape avenues for wealth found in other countries?

Is it not true that tax-free securities are used to avoid taxes to-day?

How many billions are so invested for tax-escape purposes?

How many billions are now invested in stock dividends to escape personal income taxes?

If 50 per cent income tax is needed on $200,000 personal incomes to collect sufficient taxes for Federal needs, what should be paid on undistributed corporate surplus?

How can tax-free securities be reached for taxation purposes except by inheritance taxes?

Does it justify a 50 per cent inheritance tax on great fortunes? If not, why not?

How can enormous corporate surpluses be reached for taxation purposes?

Is not a graduated tax on undistributed corporate profits fair in principle?

Many queries of equal or greater importance naturally will occur. Those who are asked to provide ways and means are charged with the necessity of raising funds and to find a just method of doing so. That is their problem.

CUBA'S CLAIMS OR THE UNITED STATES TREASURY'S—WHICH?

In to-day's press will be found a large advertisement signed by the National City Bank; J. P. Morgan & Co.; Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and other New York bankers offering $50,000,000 in Cuban bonds at 5½ per cent interest. Fifty million dollars will thus be taken from the industries of America to develop Cuba, but is it not significant that any effort to collect existing tax rates from tax-escaping agencies brings a howl of disapproval because industries are to be hampered?

A leading apostle of finance recently published the following news item:

More than two billion American dollars are working abroad earning dividends (in foreign investments) for their owners on this side of the Atlantic, according to computation of officials of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. Chairman, I am not complaining that the National City Bank can mark off its losses in foreign bonds or other securities and then make 25 per cent net profits, for this result may be due to efficiency or other legitimate causes which would speak well for the bank's management; but as a governmental proposition, after having earned 25 per cent net profits in 1922, I submit the bank should pay its fair share of taxes if we are to meet Government expenditures.

Secretary Mellon shows where $10,000,000,000 of tax-dodging funds have been laid away beyond the income-tax collector's reach. That amount we know is rapidly increasing. In my remarks of December 20 before the House I gave a list of stock-dividend melon cutting which covered several pages of the RECORD. This list did not include the National City Bank, but 328 corporations, according to the Federal Trade Commission, have distributed $2,149,151,425 in 1922 in stock dividends that will escape personal income taxes, whereas the average little fellow, the individual who has no high-priced attorneys, or partnerships that have earned a small net profit will scrape up every dollar levied on their nonescapable incomes.

MR. WANAMAKER ASKED TO LIMIT WEALTH.

Vice President Roberts's argument regarding sovietism he bolsters up with the statement that Mr. Wanamaker began business on $2,000 and saved $30,000,000 before his death. Mr. Wanamaker was a highly respected public citizen. In fact, he was such a good citizen he is reported to have said in June, 1921, regarding "distribution of wealth," that "no man ought to pile up money when there is no such need for it in the world. He can not take it with him beyond the grave. We have got to get nearer God—with less Christianity and more of the real thing." Mr. Wanamaker is gone, his wealth remains, but who possesses it to-day? Mr. Wanamaker was not a believer in sovietism, although he preached the doctrine of limitation of individual wealth. Many others have voiced the sentiments of Mr. Wanamaker regarding necessity for curbing the power of individual wealth.

The almighty dollar bequeathed to children is an almighty curse. No man has a right to handicap his son with such a burden as great wealth. That sentiment may sound to Mr. Roberts like teachings of the soviet, but Andy Carnegie, an eminent American of Scotch descent, so expressed a truth that would have been worth millions to a certain New York bank president if acted upon in time. Mr. Carnegie's wealth, running well into nine figures, is a guaranty against Russian sympathy to those who distinguish sovietism from common sense by the size of the bank account.

Another sentiment may seem strange to worshipers of wealth:

I feel that we shall ultimately have to consider the adoption of some such scheme as that of a progressive tax on fortunes beyond a certain amount * * * a tax so framed as to put it out of the power of the owner of one of these enormous fortunes to hand over more than a certain amount to an individual.

"MALEFACTORS" AND OTHER FACTORS.

About the time he was stirring up the beef trust and other trusts and "malefactors of wealth" generally, Roosevelt realized a public danger that might eventually submerge this Government in endless trouble. He knew history, for he was a historian, and he knew the hearts of men, the strength and weakness of Government. He never chanted the Lord's Prayer with pharisaical meaning, but preached the gospel of square dealing to men and nations alike.

In "malefactors" he included "criminals, felons, convicts" at heart because he knew the accepted meanings of words and was not afraid to use them. In this connection a well-known everyday philosopher, Dr. Frank Crane, said:

If one suggests the limiting of private fortunes, is he necessarily an anarchist, an upsetter, or a dangerous radical?

By no means, Doctor. The term "radical" or even "soviet" can not terrorize those who find eminent authority for the belief rather that "malefactors" may be responsible for anarchy. Attempts to circumvent law or disobey law, to flaunt public opinion and morality or shift governmental burdens on the weak and helpless, all these practices serve to undermine principles of government, whether they are termed anarchy or unrestricted license.

Those who measure the world by the atmosphere of the countinghouse or sound of the stock ticker do not take the right standards, Doctor, for we know better than they that the old-fashioned golden rule is as just now as it was when first given to men.

Let me again mention what was unintentionally overlooked by Mr. Roberts in his criticism of my remarks of December 20. In order eventually to reach wealth now tax free and laid aside by Mr. Roberts, Mr. Rockefeller, and other men of large means, including Mr. Stillman, I have offered a bill to increase inheritance taxes and a gift tax to prevent gift distributions made in order to avoid inheritance tax. The purpose of this bill is to help finance the Government's needs and to place in the Treasury a share of its accumulation of wealth that would otherwise go to heirs whether worthy or unworthy. This tax is apart from a bill to tax undistributed profits which was also introduced.

WHY AN INHERITANCE TAX?

Mr. Chairman, in my remarks to the House of December 20 I referred to ex-President Stillman, of the National City Bank, as an illustration to justify the purpose of the inheritance tax bill. I speak impersonally, because Mr. Stillman's standards of business and living morals are not exceptional if the public is correctly advised by the press, although they may not rule among his associates.

Mr. Stillman inherited a large estate from his father and also a great financial responsibility as the head of a large institution. A chapter from his life was recently revealed that furnished months of salacious reading, of such a character that men and women have been punished for offenses less serious. Is this not so when his reputed $536,000 annual income has been devoted to a judicially condemned mode of living? His resignation as head of the great banking institution was rejected, according to the press, by those who controlled the institution and who thereby set standards of business and virtue that measured their judgment by his. Public condemnation became so serious that finally they were compelled to accept the resignation. Many people have believed this country is in more danger from such practices and from such standards of business morality than from efforts to reach part of the wealth so inherited or from efforts to compel tax payments into the Public Treasury to meet needed expenses of Government. So much for the recent president of the bank. I offer to make full amends if I have not understated the facts or have not put the soft pedal on gross offenses against public morals, business morals, and public conscience that have been committed. Another phase of the Stillman case concerns the bank's policy that was influenced if not directed by a mind that stopped at nothing in effort to win a notorious lawsuit. That the resignation should have been refused for a long time speaks for the responsibility of those who refused to act in the matter.

ROBERTS WOULD GIVE AWAY THE OTHER FELLOW'S MONEY.

Still another phase of the discussion which affects the policy and purpose of the National City Bank and its officials comes from Vice President Roberts, quoted in my former discussion, in favor of cancellation of our $11,000,000,000 of foreign debts. He said:

Apparently a good many people are beginning to think that perhaps this country will do well to forgive its debtors and take advantage of whatever benefits are implied in the Lord's Prayer—and much more to the same effect. Mr. Roberts was not asking forgiveness for the recent bank president or for refusal to accept his resignation for so long a period. The spirit he expressed when urging our Government to cancel its foreign debts was to forgive debtors "as implied in the Lord's Prayer."

The National City Bank that made 25 per cent net profits last year does not forgive its debtors, and international bankers of New York City, including the National City, may now hold many foreign securities either by title or agency that will be vastly increased in value if this Government cancels its foreign debts. Secretary Mellon testified before our committee that foreign securities now held by private parties in this country are estimated at over $4,000,000,000.

It is the understanding that international bankers of New York City hold a goodly share of these foreign securities; that they are agents for a larger amount; and that these debts now are holding up recognition of the Russian Soviet Government, which has repudiated its bonds. Russia's private holdings are not subject to the Lord's Prayer. They are not to be forgiven. Only the debts of our Government are on the forgiveness list.

It is not improbable that if such cancellation of foreign debts could have been effected by Vice President Roberts, Mr. Otto Kahn, and others of like views and interests, that profits of all such bankers would have been far larger than the generous 25 per cent which was realized in 1922 by the bank.

WHEN A BANK'S POLICIES ARE OF NATIONAL CONCERN.

Mr. Roberts fails to discuss the National City Bank's policies in his last circular. Frankly, I am willing to leave to any disinterested jury a fair question, "Which is most calculated to promote sovietism in America, sane legislative efforts to compel wealth to pay its legal taxes or constant efforts by those best able to pay to dodge taxes?"

The bank by its opposition and assault upon the good faith of legislators naturally attracts attention to its own record. As the greatest bank in America it occupies a powerful position financially. Is it part of an alleged supergovernment? What is the answer?

Reference was made to the Liberian loan which passed the House by a close vote and was killed in the Senate. That bill proposed to validate worthless bonds issued by Liberia many years ago with money to be taken from the Federal Treasury. The National City Bank was among the holders of these defaulting bonds, and all parties were agreed to make that bank the "fiscal agent" for the bondholders and for exploiting Liberia at this Government's expense.

I examined different witnesses appearing before the committee favoring that loan, and leave the record, which caused the Senate's rejection, to speak for itself. The bank's mandate failed to move the Senate and $5,000,000 was saved to the Federal Treasury. When visiting Haiti several years ago I was there advised that the National City Bank had practically taken over the fiscal affairs of the Haitian Government. Hundreds of American marines were then held at Port au Prince to "maintain order." An imposing collection agency was maintained by the United States Government. Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and even our new possession, the isle of Cuba, we are told are all pouring water on the National City Bank's wheel, which stream American marines are expected to keep moving whenever and wherever needed. That stream helped furnish 25 per cent profits last year to the bank, some of whose officials have advocated the cancellation of $11,000,000,000 of the Government's foreign debts, while they hold private debts intact, excuse gross tax evasions, condemn legislators who urge tax enforcement, and employ governmental agencies to aid exploitations.

A PROFITABLE GOVERNMENT INVESTMENT.

Mr. Chairman, I submit Congress may well probe the activities of such great financial agencies that reach out over the Western Hemisphere and seek to distract attention by a wolf's cry that the "soviet goblins will get us if we don't watch out."

Amazing revelations concerning the Money Trust, interlocking directorates, and kindred subjects by the Pujo committee disclosed pre-war conditions of a decade and a half ago. With the rapid growth of centralization and big business activities throughout the world a new chapter undoubtedly could be written that would dwarf in importance the war fraud, Lockwood, and other probes. A $25,000,000 national-bank tax controversy in New York should insure active cooperation from the New York State administration, while the probe would be of immeasurable value to the country in disclosing the modern methods of pressure on State and National legislation through organized propaganda. It would not cost 10 per cent of the amount carried by the Liberian loan, and would prove a profitable investment to the country in many ways.

The average man, I submit, need not hesitate to measure his own ideals or course of conduct with the officers of these great business institutions, past or present. Big business has an important part to play in our economic system and has grown so large that, in my humble opinion, any attempt to crush it, however distant the day, will bring a train of evils, even as they have in Soviet Russia, as Mr. Roberts well says. But unrestricted growth in size and power with present-day standards, voiced by the statement that "all wealth is social wealth, by whoever owned," that we must obey the Lord's prayer by forgiving debts of other nations in order to enhance private holdings, is a queer religion and an economic teaching that deceives no one, not even those who preach one thing and practice another.

COMPARISONS WHETHER ODIOUS OR OTHERWISE.

Comparisons may be odious, but Mr. Roberts seems inclined to invite such course by his individual references to Members of Congress. Without now discussing his Chicago career or interests theretofore served in order to get a proper starting point and eliminating from consideration Mr. Stillman, the former directing head of the bank, with a record rarely approached even in this loose day and age, we find Mr. Roberts presumably voicing the policy of his bank advocating cancellation of foreign debts to this Government reaching $11,000,000,000. He has argued we can not absorb $500,000,000 of "social wealth" in foreign interest, notwithstanding one company, Standard Oil, has divided double that amount recently in stock dividends. The Roberts proposal inviting governments to repudiate their debts of course does not apply to private holdings of his own bank or other agencies.

Contrary to his proposals, I urged five amendments to the debt funding resolution that were accepted by the committee, the House, the Congress, and are now law. They provided for a Debt Commission instead of Secretary Mellon to settle the debts, prohibited cancellation or substitution of other obligations, and provided for publicity and termination of the committee's power.

England, we are now advised, will pay us between $4,500,000,000 and $5,000,000,000, or nearly one-quarter of our national debt, that was loaned her by the people of this country. When Roberts was preaching cancellation of this loan with his jughandled new version of the Lord's Prayer for the other fellow to forgive this debt, I was seeking to write into the law a provision that prevented its cancellation. In other words, the National City Bank's theory of "social wealth" belonging to the public depends on who holds the social wealth.

The average legislator or man of affairs, whatever his occupation, I again submit, need not fear comparisons of morals, ethics, or actions, either with the recent president of the National City Bank, Mr. Stillman, or its present publicity vice president, Mr. Roberts. I say this impersonally, whoever the officials may be, for when big business blocs largely control the press, our politics, and to some extent public conscience and legislation, there is always an element of selfishness in the dominating force beyond any public interest or care for general welfare.

NEITHER CZARISM OR SOVIETISM ACCEPTABLE.

To class those who do not subscribe to the bank's theory of "social wealth" as tinctured with sovietism seems to evidence a spirit of czarism in this country far more menacing than the 1 per cent of sovietism that may exist in New York or elsewhere. We may well ascertain how far big business would carry us from our ideals of government, how far it would embroil us in the controversies of other governments, how far it would place us in control of other governments of this hemisphere or other hemispheres in order to function its business and its collections from those governments; in fact, how far this country is prepared to accept control by social wealth held by a few self-appointed custodians for the remaining 98 per cent of our people. If it is to be a test of sovietism or czarism, neither will be acceptable to those who continue to believe in the aims and fundamentals of our own Government.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD with reference to the constitutional amendment concerning tax-exempt securities and its effect upon the interest rate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated by him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to is here printed in full as follows:

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, it has been alleged by opponents of the amendment that the removal of the taxation privilege would greatly increase the rate of interest which borrowing States and municipalities would have to pay on future bonds issued.

Reference to the records of 50 years shows that the difference in rates has mainly depended on safety of principal rather than on exemption from taxation. Bonds issued by the most reliable and best-known borrowers always enjoy the lowest rates, while small municipalities and districts distant from the money centers pay as high or higher rates than that paid on high-class securities not tax exempt.

Reference to the market quotations for 1922, as reported for the New York Stock Exchange, prove beyond a possible doubt that the tax-exemption privilege is of little value to the borrower. The following quotations are the highest made on several taxable securities for the year 1922:

Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe, convertible 4's issued 1910, due 1960	107⅞
Duluth & Iron Range first 5's, 1937	102½
Chicago, St. Louis & New Orleans gold 5's, 1951	104½
Louisville & Nashville gold 5's, 1937	102½
Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis 5's, 1928	103⅜
St. Paul & Duluth first 5's, 1931	100
Southern Pacific California guaranteed 5's, 1937	103½
Texas & Pacific first gold 5's, 2000	100¼
Brooklyn Edison Incorporation General 5's A, 1949	100⅛
Cincinnati Gas & Electric first ref. 5's, 1956	101
Great Falls Power first M. S. F. 5's, 1940	100
New York General Electric Light & Power Co. gold 5's, 1948	101⅜
Niagara Falls Power first 5's, 1932	101¼
Dominion of Canada 5's, 1952, subject to property tax and income tax in the United States of America	106½
Baldwin Locomotive Works first 5's, 1940	103½
General Electric debentures 5's, 1952	103
Indiana Steel 5's, 1942	103
American Telegraph & Telephone 20-year convertible 4½'s, 1933	104½
Pacific Telephone & Telegraph first 5's, 1937	100

In each case the quotations given in the foregoing are the highest for the year 1922. For the week ending January 12, 1923, the average price is lower than the peak prices of the year 1922, but in some cases the price is the same, and the quotations on several are within one point or less of the highest of 1922, with a few showing a greater difference.

A leading financial paper reported Chicago & Northwestern 4½'s as offered during the second week of January, 1923, on a 4.75 basis, Louisville & Nashville 5's quoted on a 4.75 basis, Norfolk & Western 4½'s on a 4.50 basis, and Southern Pacific 4½'s on a 4.75 basis.

Among other securities selling on a basis to yield less than 5 per cent the following may be mentioned: Illinois Central collateral trust 4's of 1952 to yield 4.97; Union Pacific refunding 4's of 2008 to yield 4.67; West Shore 4's of 2361 to yield 4.80; Chicago, Burlington & Quincy 3½'s of 1949 to yield 4.70. The Spring Valley Water Co., of California, sold $22,000,000 of bonds in 1922 on a 5.12 basis, which is better than the rate obtained on many tax-free issues.

These taxable securities of railroad and industrial and public utility corporations are gilt-edge and the best in the country. For safety of principal they compare favorably with the issues of States and municipalities, and for that reason they are readily marketable at rates closely approximating the rates paid by borrowing States and municipalities.

The stock exchange quotations cited, giving yields of the better grades of taxable securities, show that the difference in interest rates between the taxable and the tax exempt in many cases is not over one-quarter of 1 per cent and that it seldom reaches half of 1 per cent on securities approximating the same safety of principal.

A comparison of the interest rates paid on taxable and nontaxable securities over a period nearly 50 years prior to the enactment of the law creating the graduated system of income taxes shows that the State and municipal securities nearly always enjoyed a rate of interest of one-tenth to one-half of 1 per cent lower than industrials and railroads, this better rate being partially due to confidence of the investing public in the greater security of principal of the public securities and partly due to the exemption from taxation. This comparison is in accordance with researches made by the Institute for Research in Land Economics and Public Utilities, of which Prof. R. T. Ely, of the University of Wisconsin, is director.

Nearly all of the best tax-exempt State and municipal securities issued during the past year have been sold to yield 4 to 5 per cent. Some have sold on a basis higher than 5 per cent and a few have sold at prices to yield a little less than 4 per cent. Bonds of the larger cities have in many cases sold at a better rate than State bonds.

The investor in tax-exempt securities who receives an income of $1,000,000 a year is enabled by the ownership of the tax-exempt securities to evade the payment of an annual Federal tax of $550,640. This is a trifle over 55 per cent of his income.

Those who favor the tax exemption of bonds declare that the investor buys the bonds on an interest basis so low that it fully compensates the Government for the taxes which he evades paying. The market reports prove that this is not the case. Many States and municipalities pay interest on their tax-exempt bonds at rates that are comparable with the rates paid by private corporations on taxable securities. From the Commercial and Financial Chronicle of January 13, 1923, reports have been obtained of the rates at which tax-free securities have been sold in the year 1922.

Cases here cited are from widely scattered localities. It will be noted that all are equally tax free, but the rates are widely different, and none of them is sufficiently low to account for the exemption benefit received by the wealthier investors.

Typical sales of tax-free bonds in the year 1922 and the first two weeks of 1923:

Flagstaff, Ariz., $60,000 park bonds, on basis of	5.71
Howell, Nebr., $10,000 light and power bonds	4.99

Zephyrhills, Fla., $37,500	5.98

It is obvious that the investor in tax-exempt securities does not pay a premium equal to the benefit he receives. Comparison of the reports of sales of taxable and tax-exempt bonds of the past year shows it to be equally apparent that States and borrowing municipalities would not be obliged to increase their interest rates more than one-fourth of 1 per cent to one-half of 1 per cent if the income from their bonds were made taxable, while for every dollar paid out in additional interest the Government would receive $3 to $5 in additional taxes.

The acid test of the stock exchange market demonstrates that the benefit of tax exemption to the borrower is very slight. The actual profit of the tax-exempt privilege goes into the pocket of the wealthy investor at the expense of the general taxpayer. The statement is sustained by the actual experience of the year just closed.

The wealthy investor, however, seldom buys the bonds of the small municipality or a far distant district. This partly because they are not considered as secure and partly because they do not have a definite market value. Such bonds are, as a rule, bought by the small investor, to whom the tax-exempt privilege is of little value. Consequently the borrower gets no benefit whatever from the tax exemption. It will be seen from the foregoing table that most of such issues pay 6 per cent.

One of the most conclusive and lucid demonstrations of the economic folly of the tax-exemption plan was worked out by Prof. G. E. Putnam, of Washington University, St. Louis, professor of banking and currency. It appears in Washington University Studies, Volume VII, Humanistic Series, No. 1, pages 21–23, 1919.

The revenue law has been amended since 1919, reducing the rate of taxation; but the arguments presented by Professor Putnam have never been refuted, and the same principles apply now as then. Professor Putnam's article has been rewritten, and the table showing profits of investors has been revised by a Treasury Department expert to adapt it to changes in the revenue law now in effect.

By far the most conspicuous evil of tax exemption is that it completely upsets the purpose of graduated taxes. In the first place, it enables those with property incomes to escape the burden of progressive rates, thereby causing the burden to be shifted to others less able to pay. Suppose, for example, that a married person without dependent children receives a yearly net income of $50,000—after paying State taxes—from real estate valued at $1,000,000. Under the revenue act in force in 1922 his Federal income tax would be $6,640. If he converted his real estate into 5 per cent tax-exempt bonds at par, his property and income taxes thereafter would be nothing, his net income would in no way be diminished, while the man who received the same income from personal services, from farms, from city real estate, or from taxable securities would continue to pay a tax of $6,640.

The injustice of tax exemption, however, does not stop here. It not only gives rise to unwarranted discrimination in favor of property owners, as opposed to wage earners, but it also confers a much greater favor upon the wealthy classes than upon the investor in moderate circumstances. Under the Federal income tax law, for instance, a married person without dependent children is subject to a flat tax rate of 0.66⅔ per cent if his annual income is $3,000, 17.28 per cent if his net income is $50,000, and 55.064 per cent if his income amounts to $1,000,000. The yearly saving in taxes that each of these three classes might make through the purchase of a $1,000 bond yielding 5 per cent amounts to 33 cents, $8.64, and $27.53, respectively.

If the same bond were subject to taxation, the net annual yield to these investors after paying income taxes would be 4.96⅔ per cent, 4.136 per cent, and 2.247 per cent, respectively. Or, to put it another way, a 5 per cent nontaxable bond is the exact mathematical equivalent of a taxable bond yielding 5.035 per cent if the bondholder has an income of $3,000, 6.305 per cent if his income is $50,000, and 11.555 per cent if his income is $1,000,000.

The net loss to the Government on each thousand-dollar bond is shown by the figures in the last column of the table when the bonds are sold at par. When the bonds are sold at a premium the amount of that premium deducted from the capitalized value of the exemption shown in the last column will leave the net loss to the Government caused by the exemption.

Obviously the small investor has little to gain from the purchase of tax-exempt securities. If his income is exactly $3,000, it is immaterial whether he buys a 5 per cent taxable bond at par or a 5 per cent nontaxable bond, maturing in 20 years, at $100.415. The annual value of the tax-exemption privilege on his tax-exempt bond is only 33 cents, and the capitalized value $4.15. But with every material addition to his income, the incentive to buy tax-exempt bonds becomes greater. In the case of those having annual incomes of $1,000,000, the annual value of tax exemption on a $1,000 tax-exempt bond, bearing a 5 per cent rate, is $27.53. In 20 years the value of this exemption would amount to $550.60. The present worth or capitalized value of this exemption, on a 5 per cent basis, would be $343.08.

These and other significant facts relative to the unequal benefits conferred by tax exemption are shown in the following table:

Profits to investors on tax-exempt bonds, 1922.

Net income of married person without dependent children.	Total tax (calendar year 1922).	Tax rate on whole income.	Net yield of nontaxable 5 per cent bonds.	Net yield of taxable 5 per cent bonds.	Rate of interest required on taxable securities to yield 5 per cent.	Annual value of tax exemption on $1,000 5 per cent bond (annual loss to Federal Government).	Present value of tax exemption on $1,000 5 per cent bond maturing in 20 years (present value of total loss to Federal Government).
		Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.

20,000	1,720	8.60	5	4.57	5.512	4.30	53.59
50,000	6,640	17.28	5	4.135	6.305	8.64	107.67

1,000,000	550,640	55.064	5	2.247	11.555	27.53	343.08

If the supply of tax-exempt securities should be materially diminished so that the available number was insufficient to satisfy the needs of the very wealthiest classes, the price of 5 per cent tax-exempt bonds would tend to rise toward $134.308; that is, to a premium representing the highest capitalized value of the tax-exemption privilege. In actual experience it always fails to reach that premium. Under present conditions, however, no such premium is possible. Owing to the large volume of State, municipal, and Federal bonds outstanding, bonds exempt in whole or in part from the progressive income taxes, it is unnecessary for the recipients of large incomes to pay a price for tax-exempt bonds that anywhere near covers the capitalized value of the tax-exemption privilege.

Reference to the market reports of sales of State and municipal and other tax-exempt bonds shows that the premium on 5 per cent tax-free bonds sold in 1922 is usually about one-tenth of the actual present worth of that exemption to the investor receiving an income of $1,000,000 per year.

The enormous increase in the volume of issues of tax-free securities during the five years preceding and including 1922 shows that there is no prospect of diminution of that output under existing laws.

It is for this reason that the main argument in favor of exempting Government bonds from the income tax breaks down. Under a system of proportional taxation, it is probably true that tax-exempt bonds of the Federal Government would sell at a premium corresponding roughly to the capitalized value of tax exemption, and thus yield a greater return to the Government. But under a system of progressive taxes the price of the bonds is not enhanced by the capitalized value of the exemptions, and therefore the amount that the Government can gain from a lower rate of interest will not be so great as the loss in revenue from the income tax.

What the individual gains from tax exemption represents, of course, a loss to the National Treasury. This loss can not possibly be accurately calculated because there is no way of ascertaining the exact distribution of tax-exempt bonds among the various classes of taxpayers. But sooner or later the loss in tax revenue will become prodigious for the reason that the ownership of tax-exempt securities tends to become concentrated in the hands of the wealthy classes. These are the classes who would normally pay the heaviest taxes and who, moreover, would be the most alert and proficient in ferreting out some means of shifting the tax burden. That their incomes are sufficiently large in the aggregate to enable them to absorb most of the tax-exempt bonds outstanding, either through direct purchase out of current income or through the conversion of income-producing property, is shown by the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. SISSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDLIN].

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter from the American Legion with reference to the Muscle Shoals proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated by him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C., January 15, 1923.

Hon. JOHN N. SANDLIN,
Congress Hall, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The national legislative committee of the American Legion desires to lay before you a resolution concerning the Muscle Shoals plants and properties, and to urge that Congress adopt a definite policy at this session for the development and operation of this great national project.

This matter was given most careful and serious consideration at the national convention of the American Legion assembled at New Orleans, La., on Friday, October 20, 1922, and the following resolution adopted:

"Whereas at the beginning of the World War the United States Government was brought to a realization of the fact that it was wholly dependent upon the Chilean nitrate beds and German war-built nitrogen plants for its supply of nitrogen, which is absolutely necessary for the manufacture of high explosives; and

"Whereas the said United States Government did thereupon appropriate large sums of money for the erection and operation of nitrate plants Nos. 1 and 2 at Muscle Shoals for the manufacture of nitrogen in large quantities by extracting same from the air, which said plants were completed and successfully operated just prior to the armistice, or just after, and are the only air-nitrogen plants in the United States of America; and

"Whereas the above-mentioned plants have not only been left inoperative since the war, but have constantly fallen into a state of deterioration, at an expense of many thousands of dollars annually to the taxpayers of this country, while similar air-nitrogen plants in Germany were speedily converted so as to manufacture cheaply nitrogen fertilizers for the enrichment and reclamation of the arid farm lands of Germany, which has proven to be an untold blessing to the people of that country; and

"Whereas we believe that the continuance of our dependence upon foreign countries for the necessary supply of nitrogen for fertilizers in time of peace and for explosives in time of war is not only an unspeakable humiliation but is positively perilous from the point of view of the national defense: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, (1) That we, the American Legion in national convention assembled, do hereby call upon the Congress of the United States, upon the assembling of same, immediately to take up and act upon the measures pending in Congress or that may be introduced immediately upon the reconvening of same, on the subject, and to determine upon a fixed policy as to the disposition of same; and,

"(2) In determining upon the disposition to be made of said properties they may be governed by the following principles which we believe to be fundamental, namely:

"(a) No policy or plan should be accepted which does not provide for the operation of said plants in time of peace and the manufacture of fertilizer, and the test for acceptance of any offer should be the amount of fertilizer proposed to be manufactured;

"(b) No plan or policy should be adopted which is calculated to introduce Federal operation of the project;

"(c) The fertilizer production at Muscle Shoals shall have preferred supply of power in time of peace;

"(d) No plan or policy should be adopted which does not assure the Government that a research or experimental department will be maintained and conducted in connection with the plants for the purpose of keeping up with the most approved methods of nitrogen production, and that in the event of military emergency the said plants will be made available to the Government at the call of the Secretary of War for the manufacture of nitrogen for explosives.

"(3) That the national legislative committee of the American Legion be directed to use all possible legitimate efforts to the end that the Congress of the United States immediately enact such legislation as aforesaid."

From the above-quoted resolution you will note that this great project should be—

First. Under private control and operation (not under Federal or governmental control and operation);

Second. That fertilizer production shall have preferred supply of power in time of peace and nitrogen production for high explosives in time of war; and Third. That suitable legislation providing for the adoption of a permanent policy be immediately enacted by this Congress.

This entire matter has been before both Houses for some time and has been thoroughly considered and reported on by the committees after full and comprehensive hearings have been held.

As the American Legion has in national convention passed this very important resolution entitled "Reclamation and national defense," we are interested in having the matter considered at the earliest possible time, and we write you now to ask you when Congress expects to take the matter up with a view to giving careful consideration to the proposals that have been made and with a view to adopting a definite and comprehensive policy for the development and operation of this great project. In making some investigation in connection with our effort to ascertain the status of this question we have noted that on August 25, 1922, when this matter was under discussion in the House, Floor Leader MONDELL included in his remarks the following:

"I agree with the gentleman from Illinois that this matter ought to be considered and settled by this Congress and as soon as it can properly be done."

We urge upon you as a Member of this Congress immediate consideration of this legislation so vital to the national defense of our country should the country become involved in war, and so indispensable to our agricultural welfare.

Very truly yours, JOHN THOMAS TAYLOR,
Vice Chairman National Legislative Committee.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, of course I will not try to give the membership of this body any information with reference to the pending appropriation bill, because very few Members of the House know anything about it. Under the rules of this House the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations are about all the Members who have any real information about what this bill contains. But it came to my mind that probably it might be well to suggest to this Congress that if they do not give to the American people some of the things which they desire the American people may give them something that they do not want. In my humble opinion, the manner in which this Congress has treated the very serious proposition of Henry Ford to take over Muscle Shoals is inexcusable, and it should have had careful consideration from the representatives of the American people. There is no doubt, my friends, that the farmers of this Nation and the laboring people of this Nation and many clear-headed business men believe that Mr. Ford's proposition should be accepted. Whether you agree with them or not, and I am frank to say I do, I believe that the membership of this House at the present time are possessed of all the knowledge that they will ever have with reference to this proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDLIN. No; I will not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SANDLIN. You and your party have had quite a long time to operate on this matter, and I have only a short time yielded to me to protest against your failure to act. Please let me alone, with all due respect. [Applause and laughter.]

We come here to Washington and discuss various matters, and sometimes forget what the people at home are interested in and talking about. I dare say there is hardly a Member of this body to-day whose people at home are not discussing the proposition of Henry Ford with reference to Muscle Shoals, and they want us to take favorable action in the matter. I do not believe this Congress or this administration will accept Henry Ford's proposition, but in the interest of the whole people this matter ought to be settled one way or the other. Last August the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], the Republican floor leader in this body, promised that this matter would be settled in a short time. Now we have come nearly to the day of adjournment of this Congress, and it is evident that no action will be taken.

I honestly believe that if the names of those men who are spoken of as candidates for President of the United States were written on a ballot to-day and put in the hands of the voters of this country you would be surprised at the number of votes that Henry Ford would receive to put him in a position to say who should take over Muscle Shoals. And while I know that Republican leaders will not accept my suggestions here, but will treat them lightly, mark my words: If this Congress does not accept the proposition of Mr. Ford, he is going to throw a monkey wrench into somebody's aspirations for the Presidency. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. On behalf of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, the State of Kansas pays 10½ cents a bushel to send its wheat to Chicago. It costs 21 cents more a bushel to get that wheat to Liverpool. That is 31½ cents. We are shy just that much on every bushel of wheat that we ship to Liverpool. You can ship wheat from New Orleans to Liverpool for 8 cents. You can send it by barges and tugboats by river from St. Louis to New Orleans for 8 cents. That is 16 cents. If we could get the tugs and barges running from Kansas City to St. Louis and on down the river we could send our wheat to New Orleans for about 10 cents a bushel. Eight cents to Liverpool would make 18 cents. We would save the difference between 18 cents and 31½ cents, which is 13½ cents a bushel. In 1921 Kansas raised 128,000,000 bushels of wheat. At 13½ cents a bushel that would be over seventeen and one-half million dollars. It you will give us a million and a half dollars a year to fix the Missouri River for a few years we will have a 400-mile 6-foot channel to St. Louis, then save $17,500,000 a year for the farmers.

Mr. FREAR. We have already put $35,000,000 into the Missouri River. The Government has expended that much money on that river.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; but you stopped it just as you got it well under way and a 6-foot channel for 350 miles of the 400 between Kansas City and St. Louis; and I want to say that the men who assassinated the Missouri River are the greatest enemies the western farmers in this country have ever had. That is the greatest river in the world—from the Rocky Mountains to New Orleans. The States that lie along it and are tributary to it raised 380,000,000 bushels of wheat in 1921, practically half the wheat raised in this country. If they could ship their wheat to New Orleans by that river it would mean a saving to them of $50,000,000 a year. Talk about what you do with your rivers and harbors! You will do more good by fixing the Missouri River than by any other money you spend on any other waterway or the ocean itself. It flows through the greatest wheat country in the world—the Missouri Valley. Half the wheat of your country comes from there. The people of that valley can not only greatly increase the value of their crops and add immensely to the resources of that great farming region, the greatest in the world, but they can sell wheat and flour to the world cheaper than in any other way the world can get it. Why is it not done?

When I was a little boy along the Missouri River it floated more steamers than any other river in the United States except the Mississippi and the Ohio. It ran bigger steamers than any other river in the world except those two. What has become of them? I can tell you. The railroads killed them. They began with a holler about a pork barrel. They got hold of three or four little rivers up here and proceeded to make a great fuss about them. The rivers of this country have never cost this Government more than $400,000,000 in all its history. Yet the railroads have taken from us, to start with, the wealth of half a world. They can not accommodate their customers, let alone doing it at reasonable rates. They are opposed to these cheap rates by water. The railroads had a pass in the pocket of every politician. They had a pass in the pocket of every editor; and they began by bringing out the little story about the pork barrel, and it got to be very funny, to ridicule taking care of the Missouri River, the pathway provided to the sea for the wheat country. It actually ruined the Missouri River. Seventeen million five hundred thousand dollars last year was taken from our State by that joke. That was not all; they also refused cars, and we lost millions because we could not get to market. The barges would have taken it down the Missouri and to market when wheat was highest. Kansas in 1921 lost $30,000,000 it could have made if it had 50 miles more of 6-foot channel on the river to St. Louis.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACGREGOR].

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Chairman, there has been much said in this House upon the subject of State taxation of national banks. It is probable that very few of the Members know what the trouble is. To one not acquainted with the laws and procedure with reference to taxation in the various States the question seems to be hopelessly involved. Although I have listened to many witnesses, had the benefit of more or less illuminating speeches by various Members, have read the hearings and sought to comprehend what is being driven at, I confess that I am still somewhat hazy.

I want to state my conception of the situation. If I am wrong I want to be righted.

The war of words centers about the phrase in section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States permitting the taxation by the States of the share of stock of national banks. This phrase is "that the taxation shall not be at a higher rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State."

The statute has existed in this form since 1864.

Under the old general property method of taxation prevailing in most of the States up to recent years no trouble arose. Under that system there were two classes of property, real and personal, but both bore the same rate of tax. Personal property bore but a very small share of its burden because of the difficulty upon the part of taxing officers of finding the personal property. Much of that escaped and various methods and means were adopted to ferret it out without much success. In recent years many of the States have adopted the income tax and placed a low rate of taxation upon income, upon the theory that if a low rate was imposed there would not be such a great temptation to concealment. The present difficulty has arisen out of the fact that the income-tax States have sought to place a specific tax upon State and National bank shares as a separate class and considered that they were not violating any law by doing so. They conceived of "moneyed capital" as being confined to capital invested in State and National banks.

It is now conceded as established by decisions of the United States Supreme Court that "moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens" includes all moneys as such used by banks, private or incorporated, or by individuals for purposes of profit.

Under some income tax laws individuals, copartnerships, or corporations engaged in the money business other than State and National banks are not taxed upon capital but only upon income.

Thus it is held that a discrimination exists against national banks contrary to the express provisions of section 5219 of the national bank act.

The question is of vital importance because millions of dollars are involved. It is of direct importance to local communities in some of the States, as the taxes derived from the taxation of these banks are used for local purposes. If Congress is powerless to validate taxes heretofore paid, millions upon millions of dollars must be paid back to the banks on account of taxes paid under protest. As to the future the question should be settled as the tax laws of the States must be amended to conform to the determination of Congress, and until that is done there will be a condition of great confusion in every village and county and town where a State or National bank is located.

The tax commissioners of the States come to Congress and ask that section 5219 be amended so that they may continue to tax State and National banks upon a different basis than is used as to "other moneyed capital."

The national banks oppose this request and ask that the statute remain the same or, if any change is to be made, that it only be altered to permit the taxing of income at the same rate as income from other moneyed capital.

The House has passed a bill—H. R. 11939—which simply adopts the definition of the Supreme Court as to "moneyed capital" and provides that in income-tax-bases States an income tax may be imposed upon the bank in lieu of a share tax.

The language is as follows:

(a) That the tax imposed shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of the individual citizens of such State coming into competition with the business of national banks.

(b) That in any State where a tax in lieu of a property tax is assessed upon the net income derived from such other moneyed capital such State may, in lieu of a tax on the shares, impose upon the bank an income tax assessed upon the net income of the bank, but such tax shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed on the net income of such other moneyed capital.

Thus the House declined to meet the argument of the State tax commissioners that it was not feasible to adapt their systems of taxation to the rule set up by section 5219. What the House virtually says is that if the States desire to tax national bank shares they must put in vogue the old method of using coercive or persuasive measures to ascertain how much Bill Jones, in Hicksville, has put out upon notes and what profit he has made and how much he made in shaving them, and place a tax upon that profit in addition to the income tax that he pays. It must be remembered that, at least in New York State, the holder of the bank share pays a tax of 1 per cent upon the shares in addition to an income tax upon the dividends. Business corporations pay a tax upon net income, and in addition the holder of the stock pays a tax upon dividends.

The opposition to the placing of the State and National banks in a class by themselves for taxing purposes are conjuring up the usual bugaboo of Wall Street.

The picture attempted to be painted by certain gentlemen upon the floor is that they are like knights of old clad in armor and bearing a spear engaged in a bitter contest with a dragon that would devour and destroy the substance of the people unless they were protected by these valiant defenders.

They remind one of Don Quixote fighting windmills. I suppose in southern and western hamlets they frighten children by telling them that if they do not look out Kuhn, Loeb & Co., J. P. Morgan & Co., Lee, Higginson & Co., or Midder, Peabody & Co. will get them, but when they want to bring some semblance of modern civilization into their communities they plead with these same blood monsters to help rescue them from barbarism.

These financial organizations are not local to New York or Boston. Their activities extend to the whole of the United States. They reach into the small community and across the seas; they bring prosperity and the blessings of civilization to the backward States and localities awaiting development; they gather together and invest the united capital of the whole Nation with the attending benefit of all of the people of the country.

When New York, howsoever feebly, demurs to the growing and disastrous practice of Federal aid in State activities the cry arises that New York makes its money out of the other States and therefore should not protest, but there seems to be a prevalent tendency upon the part of the other States which are the recipients of the bounty of New York to "bite the hand that feeds them."

In the anxiety of some gentlemen upon the floor of this House to pose as valiant knights engaged in hand to hand contest with money-thirsty monsters, they are willing that the State and national banks shall reap greater profits and build up greater surpluses. They would not spoil the picture by requiring the banks which take a greater toll from the people than anyone else to use a portion of it for the alleviation of the burdens of taxation from the backs of those who help to contribute to the swelling of bank surpluses.

Theoretically it is proper that State banks, national banks, private banks, financing institutions and private individuals loaning money for a profit should be upon the same basis of taxation. For untold years tax experts endeavored to do this very thing but failed. Many, many methods were tried to ferret out the concealed wealth of the country without success.

There is no possible objection to the taxing of the capital engaged in competition with banks, but we should be practical and not theoretical. It might be perfectly feasible to ferret out just how much capital is employed by the great financial institutions which have been inveighed against with so much gusto, but if you tax them upon their capital is it also necessary, in order to prevent inequality, to find every individual in the State who is using his capital or any portion of it to the same end?

The reason advanced for not permitting State and national banks to be placed in a separate class for taxing purposes is that it would be giving the power to States to tax the national banks out of existence. But why this sudden fear? No one seemed to think about this danger before some astute lawyer raised the question as to whether "other moneyed capital" did not extend beyond the capital used by banks. For 20 years the State and national banks in New York State have been taxed as a separate class. During all of this time there was no such fears as are now expressed that they were discriminated against.

The whole proposition seems to be that the banks desire to escape taxation. They have succeeded in securing an interpretation of words different than the heretofore accepted definition, and having secured their point of vantage they are beating tomtoms and raising wild fears of destruction to the banking system of the country by wolfish legislatures. I can picture the gleeful chuckle of the banker as he contemplates the shifting of taxation from himself to the backs of the people who are contributing to his pile of gold through many methods that partake of the nature of usury. I can contemplate the satisfaction of the farmer when he appreciates the fact that the village banker is going to load his part of the burden of local taxes onto his patrons and enjoy his profit from loaning money to them free and clear upon the theory that "If you can't get the other fellow, you can't get me."

It is perhaps not considered proper to discuss legislation contemplated by the gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol, but inasmuch as the etiquette has already been violated a little more violation will do no harm.

The Senate committee to which the House bill was referred has reported a substitute which provides for taxation of the shares of national banks in one of three ways:

1. By taxation of shares, provided that "the rate of taxation shall not be higher than the rate applicable to other moneyed capital employed in the business of banking within the taxing State," and provided further, that "said rate shall not exceed the average of the rates applied in said State to shares in mercantile, manufacturing, or business corporations doing business in said State or in such of said corporations as are taxed therein."

2. By including dividends derived from shares in the taxable income of an owner or holder.

3. Taxing the net income of the bank, providing that the rate of taxation upon the net income shall not be higher than the highest of the rates imposed by the taxing State upon the net income of mercantile manufacturing or financial corporations doing business within its limits.

Inasmuch as the time is limited within which Congress can act to give relief to the situation that is causing great confusion throughout the whole country I believe that it would be wise for the House to study the proposal of the Senate so as to be in position to act speedily in the event that the Senate passes it and sends it to the House. So far as New York State is concerned the settlement of the controversy is of vital importance to every community, as the tax is a local tax and the tax status of every village and town will be in confusion until it is settled. The question is a perplexing one because of the different methods of taxation in vogue in the various States of the Union. So far as I can see the House bill offers no relief to New York.

The Senate bill is a vast improvement over the House bill. The House bill gives no relief, but adopts a definition of the Supreme Court of other moneyed capital.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Does the gentleman understand that many banks are paying the taxes?

Mr. MACGREGOR. They always did pay the taxes without protest.

Mr. SNYDER. And many banks have paid it since the decision?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Yes; but the big banks have been paying it under protest.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, a speech delivered here a few days ago by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW] embodied accusations of a very grave character against Members of this House. It charged them not merely with commission of lawless acts but with having made a building furnished by the Government to facilitate our task of enacting legislation the theater of gross violations of law. I have not taken the floor to answer that imputation. The ordinary presumption of law that public officers have performed faithfully their full duty surely extends to the building in which these duties are discharged and assumes that it is always occupied for the purpose that caused its erection. That particular speech, as far as I am concerned, which began with a rhyme and was continued without logic to a conclusion without reason, is completely answered by stating that doubtful as is the quality of its opening verse, yet nevertheless there was more poetry than truth in the whole production. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, it was said by Herbert Spencer that as there is a soul of good in things evil, so also is there a soul of truth in things that are themselves untrue. And the late Monsignor Hugh Benson, as profound in philosophy as he was eloquent in speech, insisted that it was this soul of truth in a false statement which gave it any force whatever. A statement wholly untrue, he said, would fall completely stillborn from the lips that uttered it and never get into circulation at all. Now, even this speech of the gentleman from Georgia contains a soul of truth, and it is this; that so far prohibition has utterly failed to prohibit. All efforts to enforce it in certain localities have resulted in failure so complete as to evoke the extraordinary denunciations which the gentleman from Georgia scattered right and left on this floor.

Mr. Chairman, there is much stronger and much weightier testimony than that of the gentleman from Georgia to the completeness of this failure to enforce prohibition. It is the statement of the President that disregard of the eighteenth amendment and of the laws passed to enforce it has become so widespread and so open as to constitute a grave national scandal.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the bootlegger and the other sinister elements which have been called into existence by futile attempts to enforce this measure are regarded by most people as sources of amusement. I view them in a very different light. I think we have here one of the gravest conditions that ever confronted the American people. Persistent disregard of law by persons not habitually lawbreakers, who belong not to the class from which lawbreakers are recruited but to the best elements of our society, is a calamity so grave that unless it is remedied speedily and completely the authority of our Government will be undermined and its very existence seriously imperiled.

Everyone will admit that unless respect for the law be restored obedience to law is impossible. How is it to be restored?

Respect for law can not be restored by force. It is the unbroken lesson of all history that no law can be enforced in any locality against the opposition of a large majority of its inhabitants. And for that reason in certain localities of this country the prohibition amendment can not be enforced; even though its enforcement be attempted by all the resources which this Government can employ. Whether this be morally right or wrong, whether it be politically desirable or undesirable, it is a fact, I repeat, capable of demonstration. And as such it must be faced by the lawmakers into whose hands in large degree the task of providing for the safety of the country is committed.

I doubt if any gentleman here in his heart believes that this law can be enforced. History teems with instances of attempts to enforce obnoxious laws by governments in different parts of the world, and it records the failure of every one. It also tells in lurid characters the evil results of these attempts, constantly repeated through all the ages, always unsuccessful, but often causing the ruin of the governments that undertook them.

Mr. Chairman, our own country became free—it overthrew the authority of England—because of an attempt to enforce upon the people of the Colonies a statute, lawfully passed, entirely constitutional, but which was in conflict with their customs and against which their patriotism revolted. The great parliamentary revolution in England, which subverted the English throne and cost an English king his head, was caused by an attempt to enforce payment of ship money, a perfectly lawful tax—so declared by a majority of the 12 judges of England assembled in solemn tribunal—but which the people regarded as unjust and refused to pay. And in the domestic chronicles of every nation we read again and again of statutes passed with all proper formality, but disregarded generally, and of no actual authority whatever.

A great lawyer—I think the greatest of his time, if not the very greatest who ever adorned the professional life of this country—the late Mr. James C. Carter, for many years the undisputed leader of the American bar, devoted the last seven years of his life, after he had retired from active practice, to writing a series of lectures for the Harvard Law School upon the philosophy of law. The main proposition underlying them was that all law is merely custom, that no statute can have the force of law which does not enforce customs already established in the locality affected by it.

In every community there are some few elements hostile to the views of the majority and disposed to resist their customs. The function of law as he defined it was to impose on this recalcitrant minority obedience to customs already established by the great majority. Of course, he did not include in this definition of law statutes providing for what has been aptly called municipal housekeeping—the building of bridges, the cleaning of streets, the delivery of letters, and other facilities for developing commerce and promoting the general comfort. But every attempt to regulate by statute the relations of men toward their government or toward each other which did not embody a custom already established he held was incapable of enforcement. Instead of producing order, it was always a source of confusion and disorder. Surely no greater illustration of that truth can be found than in the experience of our own country with reference to the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments.

Mr. Chairman, the President has announced his intention of enforcing the eighteenth amendment by all the power that he can command. I am glad of it. I am glad the attempt will be made, because I believe that the result will be another demonstration of the utter futility of attempting to control the customs of men by enactments placed upon the statute books. He has asked, I believe, for $8,000,000 to carry out this purpose. I have voted for it. I would cheerfully have voted him $80,000,000 to prosecute the experiment to its utmost conclusion. But after he shall have employed all of the agencies with which $8,000,000 or $80,000,000 can supply him, will he have any greater resources at his command for this purpose than were actually invoked to enforce the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments?

I suppose there are some gentlemen here—I know there is one—who can recall the days after the Civil War when the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments were added to the Constitution, and all the power of the Government was exercised to enforce them. Not merely was it attempted to enforce them, but for a while they actually were enforced. The negroes were given the suffrage and they actually exercised it. They had all the power of government in their hands. They controlled the legislatures, the courts, the police, and the executives in the Southern States. And back of all these was the National Government in all its branches—both Houses of Congress, the Federal judiciary, the Army, and the Navy—every element and force that civilized government could organize, and all failed.

The amendments perished of their own weight. They are a dead letter in the States which were opposed to them. The negro is excluded from the suffrage. Over the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments the waters of defeat have rolled, and I believe their authors would rejoice if the waters of oblivion covered them also.

Mr. Chairman, since Mr. Harding can summon to his aid for the enforcement of this provision no agency that was not employed to enforce the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, the results of his efforts will be exactly the same. The only question is how soon will the people of this country decide that their laws should conform to the customs of the people. It may take a long time, and during that period we will have bootleggers busier than ever; we will have them reaping larger profits; we will have people amusing themselves with violation of the law and treating it as an excellent source of humor and jest, to the grievous injury of morals and order. But when the demoralization which such conditions must necessarily produce shall have been remedied by abandonment of this attempt to invade the domain of personal liberty, then I think the people will turn to discovering the soul of good in the prohibition movement, which it undoubtedly contains, and to making it available for the welfare of society.

That it is utterly impossible to enforce the eighteenth amendment, no matter what agencies are invoked, may possibly be disputed by some gentlemen here. Well, by waiting we shall soon see. The appropriations we have made indicate that the experiment of attempting to enforce it by all governmental agencies will be pressed to the end.

Meanwhile I think this much is absolutely certain: If the eighteenth amendment should ever be made effective it will not be by this Government—not by this republican Government of ours—but by another Government which will be developed and called into existence by employment of the agencies which must be invoked to make enforcement successful. For the very idea that underlies this amendment is utterly repugnant to every element of democracy. And, therefore it can be enforced only by subversion of the Government, which is the embodiment of democracy.

What is the object, the real ultimate object, of prohibition? By the declaration of its advocates and its supporters themselves, its object is to make men good, to improve their morals. I do not think any prohibitionist will dispute that definition.

But this is precisely what no government can succeed in doing, and which no democratic government can undertake to do without violating principles that are absolutely fundamental.

Ever since government was established on earth some men have attempted through exercise of its coercive and punitive powers to improve the morals of people subject to its authority, and always with results the most distressing and, indeed, the most shocking in all human experience. Governments can not improve men. It is the task of men to improve governments. Government always reflects the quality of the men and women who are its subjects. Despotisms may and frequently do prescribe rules of conduct for individuals in all their avocations. Democracy can take no step in that direction without violating its essential principles so deeply as to imperil its existence.

It must be conceded—surely nobody will dispute—that the essential difference between a democracy and all other systems of government is that democracy assumes the people—not any number of them, or any class among them, but the whole people—are the safest depository of power. And this principle necessarily rests on the belief that the people—the masses of the people—are always governed by morality and love of justice.

All other governments are based upon the theory that men are naturally so debased and depraved that if each one were left free to dispose of his own energies he would refuse to work; preferring to trust for his subsistence to plunder of his fellow men rather than to the labor of his own hands; and that if control of government were intrusted to all men its powers would inevitably be abused and perverted by the poor, who are always a majority, to oppression and plunder of the rich, who are always a minority.

Democracy, on the other hand, is based on the belief that men if left free to dispose of their own energies will work just as diligently and much more effectively for a share of what they produce—that is to say, for wages—than men have ever worked through fear of the lash; and if all are given an equal voice in the control of government its powers will not be perverted to the oppression of any, but will be exercised for the protection of all subject to its authority. In a word, democracy is built on faith in human virtue; all other forms of government on distrust of human vices.

Until the establishment of this Republic democratic government did not exist in the world. All the experiences of our national life prove conclusively that while the people, being human, are liable to error, yet a government controlled by them will come nearer to establishing perfect justice and to be administered with wisdom than any other that has ever been organized by civilized man. Never has a political experiment been crowned with such success nor blessed with such valuable fruits; nowhere is property so secure; nowhere is justice so impartial or so effectively administered; nowhere has prosperity been so general nor happiness so unclouded as in this land, whose Government rests upon faith in the virtue of all men.

But what is virtue? Is virtue obedience to law enforced through fear of punishment? If that be the case, virtue is most extensive and at its highest in the penitentiaries. [Laughter.] What is virtue? It is voluntary observance of the moral law. No conduct, however irreproachable, can have any claim to merit unless it be the product of free will. That man deserves no credit for going right who has not been free to go wrong. It is the exercise of free will in obedience to the law of justice—the law of Heaven—which constitutes individual virtue; that virtue which is the sole foundation on which free institutions can securely rest.

It is the very essence of the Christian moral law that while man is capable of sinking to depravity that is indescribable, so also is he capable of rising to improvement that is immeasurable; improvement so vast that God Himself could assume human nature, not the semblance of it, nor the appearance of it, but the substance, the reality of it, without any injury to His Divinity. All experience shows that not until he has reached the degree of improvement which Christianity has made attainable is man fit to support the burdens or enjoy the privileges of democracy.

It is also an essential feature of the Christian moral law that no man can be improved in morals by government or by any agency except himself. The Christian revelation was not given to a government. Not a word of it was addressed to a ruler, nor to a senate, nor to a committee, nor to an aggregation of men. Every word was addressed to the individual, enjoining him to effect his own improvement by observance of its injunctions. He is commanded to govern himself but to refrain from attempts to govern anybody else; to judge himself with severity but he must never assume to judge his neighbor. From the lips of Divine Gentleness words of reproach seldom issued, except to those who violated the injunction, Judge not, lest ye be judged; be not critical of the mote in your brother's eye, but be careful to take the beam out of your own eye. Who, then, in a state of Christian civilization has any right to judge the morality of my own conduct but myself? If I choose to abstain from liquor or any other indulgence of my own free will, it is creditable to me. But if I observe the same abstinence under terror of the policeman's club, I am entitled to no credit whatever.

Of course, no one can question the right of the State to enforce obedience to all laws enacted within the scope of its legitimate domain. What is that domain? Democracy holds that everyone has an inalienable right to a certain measure of liberty. To defend that right is the object for which democratic government is organized. What is that measure of liberty? It is that measure which each man can enjoy equally with every other man. While government remains within the natural scope of its authority, leaving each man or woman free to do anything that does not injure anyone else, its laws will be obeyed without invoking any force to make them effective. But every attempt to enforce morality upon people through government has always been productive of disorder, frequently of the worst cruelties that have ever disgraced human nature.

Man has always been capable of doing violence to his brother; of killing him under the influence of passion. But where appetite, lust, fear, thirst for vengeance, moves the slayer he is always satisfied by the death—the prompt death of the person standing in the way of gratifying his desires. He never becomes so perverted from all the instincts of humanity as to torture any man in addition to killing him, except under one influence and that is of fanaticism. And what is fanaticism? It is a purpose to make men good, not according to their own conscience and by their own free will but according to some rule prescribed by others. And this fanaticism, I repeat, has been the source of the most horrible enormities that have ever disgraced humanity.

I have read in history of awful cruelties practiced by some men upon others, but I have failed to discover a single one that was not the fruit of fanaticism—the attempt of some men to regulate by law the conduct of others. And if this eighteenth amendment can be made effective, to what extent may not government go in regulating every action of our daily lives?

There is nothing that can be said in favor of this scheme to regulate what men may drink that would not apply with equal force to regulation of what they may eat or what they may wear or what they may do. There are, indeed, some who seek to justify prohibition as a measure to guard public health, claiming that the use of alcoholic stimulants in any form is dangerous to physical well-being. I deny it. There is no evidence whatever to show that the use of light wines and beers has ever injured anyone, certainly none sufficient to outweight and overbalance the unbroken experience of mankind in all countries and in all centuries. But, however this may be, it is certainly true that alcoholic drinking has not caused half the injury to health that has been caused by excessive eating. Doctors differ about the effects produced by use of intoxicants, but they are absolutely unanimous in telling us that most men are actively digging their graves with their teeth long before the sexton becomes active in their behalf with a spade in the cemetery. About the truth of that statement I think there is no doubt whatever. Are we next to have a constitutional provision prescribing what men may eat? It would be just as reasonable, just as justifiable, as this eighteenth amendment. And when our food as well as our drink is regulated by law, there will still remain the fact that irregular hours of work is a fruitful source of physical disorders. How long will it be before the hours at which we are to rise and the hours at which we must go to bed shall be fixed by statute—the hours when we shall work and the hours when we shall rest? There are ten thousand times stronger justification for such enactments than for prohibition. Because in the case of unwholesome food and irregular hours there can be no question of the evil consequences they bear, while with respect to light wines and beers there is, as I have said, no evidence that anybody was ever hurt by them. And I do not think there is any evidence that anybody ever got drunk from use of them.

And then after our food and drink and our hours of labor are fixed by law, there will still remain the character of our occupations for our Government to regulate. For it is common knowledge that some employments are more trying to health than others. And when all these are regulated and prescribed by statute there are a great many people who believe that clothing—especially feminine clothing—is frequently a source of physical ills. And so we will probably have a statute prescribing the length of the female skirt, and perhaps the degree to which a lady may expose her shoulders to the admiration of her friends. And then, when all these measures are enacted, the conditions produced by them will not be original. There is nothing original in vice or in folly, as I have often pointed out on the floor of this House. We will have simply extended the domain of the penitentiary over the whole field of society. For all these things are regulated in the penitentiary. There the hours of labor, the nature of employment, the food, the clothing of its inmates—all are prescribed and determined by the Government.

What shred of democracy, what fragment of freedom would remain to a people in a country governed by such laws?

Mr. Chairman, I have said that attempts to regulate morals and improve them by statutes—well intentioned though they may have been—have caused the worst cruelties, the blackest persecution which stain the record of humanity. And this is mentioned not as an abstract reflection but as a warning against dangers which are very real and ominously imminent. Continued attempts to enforce prohibition—persistence in the effort to make men good by law—must in the very nature of things bear the same fruit here that it has always borne. It will light the fires of persecution in this country as it lit them in Smithfield more than three centuries ago and as it has lit them in every country where similar attempts have been made. Nay; it has already lighted them.

At the Democratic National Convention two years ago, in an effort to have a demand for modification of the most drastic features of the Volstead Act embodied in the party platform, I ventured to point out that attempts to regulate morals always resulted in aggravating the very immoralities they were intended to suppress, while at the same time they led inevitably to perpetration of enormities that were hardly conceivable. That statement was derided at the time as rhetorical extravagance. Well, the possibility against which I then sounded a warning is to-day an actual condition in our country.

In the newspapers during the last few days there have been accounts of a tragedy in Louisiana so unspeakably horrible that a great many of us found it difficult to believe that such enormities could possibly be perpetrated by human beings. In fact, a leading article in the New York Times, after the bodies—the mutilated bodies cast into Lake La Fourche—had been found and after the frightful injuries which had been perpetrated upon them before death had been proved by overwhelming evidence, expressed disbelief in the whole report as absolutely irreconcilable with human nature. And that statement was perfectly natural. It is irreconcilable with human nature except under the influence of fanaticism. Fanaticism—that is to say, government regulation of morals run mad—it is now clear can produce enormities worse than any ever yet perpetrated—so unspeakable that even human imagination can not conceive them.

I have mentioned the tortures with which we have become familiar through the study of history. I have read of Christians wrapped in cloths saturated with oil and then set afire, to light the footsteps of Cæsar on his way through the streets of Rome to the temple of worship or the scene of festivities in honor of the gods. Why? Because Christian men and women refused to burn incense before some tutelary deity of the pagan world, and this was considered gross depravity by the lawmakers of the time. To eradicate it from human society men and women of the purest lives and noblest characters were thrown to wild beasts, torn apart with red-hot irons, scalded in caldrons of boiling oil, roasted on gridirons, and all this, not by the rabble or the worthless, but by elements that were considered the best of the community. In later years the thumbscrew and the rack were employed with dreadful frequency, not to make men bad, but in a perverted notion of making them good.

I have seen at Nuremburg that metal figure known as The Maid, which when opened disclosed a chamber the sides lined with sharp spikes and these closing upon the victim of fanaticism made death as agonizing as it was slow. Yet in all history there is nothing recorded of ferocity and cruelty which parallels that hideous slaughter and torture in Louisiana. It excludes the torturers from all right to be classed among elements of humanity—to be classed even with the brutes. For the brute does not destroy his fellow brute and prolong the killing to enjoy his dying agonies. He kills that fellow brute because he fears him, or because he wants something which that brute holds or threatens to take; and when he kills him he does it as fast as he can, just as a human being perpetrating murder to gratify any ordinary passion or impulse accomplishes the crime as rapidly as possible and then in frantic haste flees from the scene of it. It is only under the influence of fanaticism this fanatical desire to make men good, not according to their own free will but according to the notions of others, that such fiendish enormities could have been possible as have been perpetrated here in our own country by men calling themselves apostles of morality and order. This horror can not be adequately described in words, because words are evolved from experiences, and, thank Heaven, the world has hitherto been free from any such experience. It can not be called savage, because no savage ever inflicted injury so fiendish. It can not be called bestial without grave injustice to the beasts. It can only be called Ku-Kluxism and left at that. [Applause.]

This is not the time nor the place to denounce in adequate terms that particular manifestation of unparalleled human ferocity. I mention it only to emphasize that these fiends in human shape who sank to such awful depths of ferocity were not the evil-disposed people of the community. They are said to be the best people. And I do not find, according to the testimony, now coming out that they ever undertook an act of violence for any other reason than to enforce what they conceived to be the moral law. A man is flogged or killed or tortured in ways that can not be described with decency because he is a bootlegger. A woman is taken from her home and sent adrift in the woods and the darkness of night because they think her morals are below the standard which they have prescribed for the regulation of human conduct. There is not a suggestion that the perpetrators of these outrages were moved by any desire to make men bad according to their notion of morals. And, indeed, it would have been impossible for any human beings—for any beings with the semblance of humanity—to have perpetrated these diabolical enormities if they had not been under the mistaken but grossly perverted impression that they were advancing the cause of morality.

Mr. Chairman, this warns us, or should warn us, that Almighty God, who has specifically reserved to Himself the right to punish for violations of the moral law, will not suffer any man or society to usurp His authority. From the dawn of creation men have attempted to invade His jurisdiction in this respect, and the result has always been that they have turned into fiends by the awful deeds they perpetrated. It must now be perfectly clear that when the State or any of its members invades that domain which God Almighty has reserved for Himself, by undertaking to enforce any notion of morals on human beings by the club of a policeman, hideous results inevitably follow, of which this Louisiana butchery and torture are the latest examples.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCKRAN. Certainly, but I may have to ask for a little more time.

Mr. BLANTON. Concerning the nonenforcement of the Volstead Act, is not the great trouble, after all, in the fact that too many distinguished Members vote $8,000,000 to the President to enforce the law and then place $80,000,000 of obstacles in his way by obstructive speeches?

Mr. COCKRAN. I know of no such obstruction that could be created by any speech. The obstacle is not one that can be created. It is inherent in the scheme itself, as I have been endeavoring here to point out. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the interruption of the gentleman from Texas has somewhat diverted the current of my argument. I will endeavor to resume it, but I may have to ask the gentleman from Mississippi to give me a little more time.

Mr. SISSON. How much time has the gentleman consumed?

Mr. COCKRAN. About 35 minutes, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has six minutes remaining.

Mr. SISSON. I will give the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. COCKRAN. I will perhaps be able to get through sooner than that.

Mr. SISSON. I will give the gentleman 10 minutes, if that will satisfy him.

Mr. COCKRAN. I ask for additional time, not to satisfy me but to satisfy the House so far as I can.

Mr. Chairman, I shall endeavor to utilize the additional time placed at my disposal by the kind forbearance of the gentleman from Mississippi, in pointing out the soul of good that can be found in this evil thing—the attempt to control men's morals and men's individual actions by the operation of law and the policeman's club. Here we can get a great deal of light from the experience of the Southern States in dealing with the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments.

It is not necessary to remind gentlemen that the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments have not been nullified throughout the entire country. In the vast majority of States they are in full operation now. Nobody would think of suggesting repeal of them. Why? Because in these parts of the country they do not conflict with any custom or usage or patriotic belief of the people. In the South conditions are different. There opposition to them is general and insuperable. I have already mentioned the failure of all attempts to enforce them. Let me ask attention now to the results of which these attempts caused more than two generations ago.

There are a few here probably who can recall the depth of that bitter contest. For 12 years the whole white people of the Southern States were diverted from the great task of restoring their industrial system to the vastly more urgent task of overthrowing and expelling the carpet-bag governments which were sapping their prosperity and threatening their civilization. When that was accomplished I doubt if in the whole history of mankind there was ever such a metamorphosis as followed immediately. Never had any people been called upon to face such a difficult situation. Not only had they been through the most devastating war ever waged, their fields laid waste, their towns destroyed, the majority of young men capable of labor either maimed or killed, the whole industrial system subverted by enforced change almost in a night from slave labor to free labor. But when at last the carpet-bag governments were overthrown that country blossomed like a garden as if at the touch of a magician's wand.

Mr. Chairman, that splendid result was achieved because no further attempt has been made to enforce these constitutional provisions in the States where they are repugnant to the conscience and desires of the community. Would the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] or the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW] restore now the conditions that were abolished by overthrow of the carpet-bag governments? Would they restore suffrage to the negroes of the South, as the Constitution demands? Would they even go the lesser distance and support the proposal of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] to reduce the representation from Southern States where negroes have been excluded from suffrage, as the Constitution specifically directs? That is an injunction laid upon the Congress. Will the gentleman obey it? Will he lead the way in giving it force? No; he will not. I will answer for him.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall answer for myself if the gentleman will permit me. The fourteenth and fifteenth amendments are in force in the State where I live.

Mr. COCKRAN. Anything is possible in the State of Texas; the gentleman himself furnishes conclusive evidence of that. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman would not try to enforce these provisions and he ought not to try. Nobody would enforce them. Not even a Republican Congress would venture to renew the experiment that failed so dismally. Few Republicans here will vote even for Mr. TINKHAM'S bill punishing the South by a reduction of representation in Congress and in the Electoral College for the nullification of these amendments. Why? Because that nullification is justified by its results. It has borne the most valuable fruits that perhaps have ever yet justified a spontaneous movement among the people. The same will prove to be true with reference to this amendment. In a great part of this country prohibition will enforce itself. It embodies the judgment and conforms to the customs of the people in those localities. But in others it is repugnant to the people, and there it is not enforced and never can be. Attempts to enforce it may continue, causing confusion, increasing bootlegging profits, widening disrespect for the law and disobedience to it, but it will never be enforced—never can be. The whole history of the human race proves that to absolute demonstration.

What then will be the outcome of these conditions? Where is the soul of good in these futile efforts to make the eighteenth amendment effective all over the country? The soul of good in it all is the disappearance of the saloon.

It needs no provision of law to effect suppression of this serious menace to order and blot upon decency.

It is already effected—not by reason of the eighteenth amendment, but by a public opinion that is practically unanimous. The position taken by Governor Smith, of New York, in his last campaign with respect to this question will become, in my judgment, the position of the entire country. He seeks to harvest for the public welfare this general disposition to suppress the saloon. He pledges himself that, so far as he can control it, the saloon, which has already disappeared, shall never be suffered to return. Suppression of it is entirely within the legitimate powers of the State. It invades no right of personal liberty, because the State—the government—has always the right to control its markets, and every shop is a feature of the public market. The State has the absolute right to declare that the agencies which it furnishes for the improvement of commerce shall not extend to anything to which it does not wish to extend them. And if the State declares, as it has declared, that they shall not extend to the saloon—that the saloon may not abut on any of its highways—then the saloon is doomed. By the saloon I mean places where people consume liquor purchased on the premises. It was the consumption of liquor at the place where it had been purchased that has caused practically all the intemperance which good people have deplored. There may be some instances in which a man consuming whisky or brandy in his own house and at his own table got drunk, but if there be, such instances are exceedingly rare. The restraining influence of the family is generally sufficient to prevent excess when the temptation to false conviviality is absent. But however this may be, I challenge anyone to show a single instance where men have got drunk on wines or beers. To a great number of people wine or beer is as much an article of food as the meat and bread they eat. And they will have such articles, because they are free men, and, being free, they can not be deprived of any right which is an essential feature of freedom while they remain Americans. To insure them peaceable enjoyment of this elemental right by relaxation of the Volstead Act in its more drastice provisions is the object to which the New York Democracy was pledged.

I am sorry that Governor Smith's name was mentioned here the other day. His task in dealing with this question is an exceedingly difficult one. And it is made more difficult by the extraordinary excellence of his former administration. He must in this as in all other matters try to match his own record—that record which won such popular approval after two years of actual service as chief executive that 1,000,000 votes were cast for his reelection in 1920 beyond those polled by the presidential candidate of his party. To fall below that record will be failure; to match it will be success; to exceed it would be a miracle.

We are not looking for miracles, although we are permitted to pray for them and therefore to hope for them. And if he succeeds in solving this problem in a way to win popular approval—and thus solve it permanently—it will be a miracle—perhaps the greatest of recent political history.

I have no right to speak for him. I know nothing of his plans or aspirations for the future beyond this: In a conversation with him just before he left New York City to assume, or rather to resume, the governorship of the State, reference was made to the fact that his name had been widely mentioned in connection with the Presidency, whereupon he said:

It would be ridiculous to decline publicly or privately a nomination that never has been tendered me and that very probably never will be. This much, however, I can say. Anyone who now talks to me about being a candidate for the Presidency may be well disposed but he is not well advised. I have here a task greater than my abilities—certainly difficult enough to demand the utmost exercise of them—and no man who suffers his mind to be diverted from the task before him to consider the possibility of attaining some other office can ever discharge effectively the duties actually at hand.

In the campaign of last November his position with respect to prohibition was made absolutely clear in his speeches and in the platform on which he stood without equivocation or reservation of any kind. It is this: The saloon has gone.

He stands pledged to invoke all the powers of government and of civilized society, so far as he can command them, to prevent its reappearance. And this means that the chief source of intemperance is removed.

With respect to light wines and beers, as I have said, the custom in certain parts of the country will continue, no matter what Congress may decree. By making the laws conformable to the customs of the people in this respect, there can be little doubt that drunkenness will be wholly prevented, temperance promoted, even total abstinence rendered ultimately possible.

On the other hand, persistence in attempting to change the customs of the people by coercive laws will aggravate drunkenness, retard the growth of temperance, and work serious if not irreparable injury to the supremacy of law and the safety of society.

If Governor Smith's program for New York should be extended to the whole country it would not seriously change conditions except in the States containing large cities. And in these communities the change would operate to make the whole body of law popular, and therefore effective. The liberty of each individual would be made secure by recognizing his inalienable right to be governed in matters of morals by his own conscience, and at the same time the authority of the State, by confining every exercise of it within the domain which properly belongs to it would be absolutely unchallenged. The bootlegger and every other violator of the law will be eliminated and punished with the assistance of public opinion spontaneously and effectively expressed.

Is this a fanciful picture? Is prompt and universal obedience to law a fantastic dream that can not be realized? Or is it a result capable of attainment by enlightened statesmanship?

In the city of New York during the most crowded periods of the day, when it is difficult to pass through the highways, where every vehicle is struggling eagerly with innumerable others for every inch of space in which some advance may be accomplished, an attempt by one to get ahead by means inconsistent with equal justice to all would meet with immediate and general resistance. If continued it would lead to riot.

But there is one vehicle before which all will give way, not in obedience to any force but spontaneously, unanimously, instantaneously. At the very moment when each one is attempting to crowd forward with all the energies at the command of its driver all will draw aside at the sound of a bell signaling the appearance of a car that is not bearing a millionaire to his pleasures nor a merchant to his enterprises nor a magistrate to his duties but is speeding on an errand of mercy, bringing succor and aid to some victim of an accident, whose identity is unknown to any of those who are making way for it, undisclosed even to the driver and the doctor who are hastening to his relief. That ambulance needs no law to give it the right of way. If any misguided person should attempt to obstruct it for a minute, or try to take precedence of it, no policeman would be needed to clear the obstacle away. Every pair of human hands in the neighborhood would spring spontaneously to the throat of the recalcitrant driver and pull him from the seat on which he was trying to obstruct or delay the mission of charity and of goodness. There is no reason why all the laws of the country, why every exercise of public functions, should not enjoy that same enthusiastic, spontaneous, irresistible support which is freely given to the ambulance. The disposition of this people is always sound. No higher standard of morals ever prevailed among men anywhere. Let us but respect in our laws the customs of our citizens; let us but give each one the right to do whatever he pleases—provided it does no harm to anyone else—let us realize the truth underlying our democratic system that to each individual must be intrusted the task of working his own moral improvement; and then this Government, like the ambulance speeding on its errand of mercy, will proceed on its errand of justice, facilitated and upheld by unanimous public support; the whole people gladly yielding to the laws of their country obedience as implicit as they yield to the laws of their God. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. How much time did the gentleman use?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman consumed 56 minutes, yielding back 4 minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, to-day the United States is closing its third year under national prohibition of the manufacture, transportation, and sale of intoxicating liquors, and at this time we have before us in this House three expressions as to the great, tremendous pending problem of law and order. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW] made a speech the other day which has aroused the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL] and the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN]. What was the speech of the gentleman from Georgia that has so aroused these opponents of enforcement of the law? Simply that law and order should prevail in this country, and that if there are any among the citizens of this Republic who hold a higher duty to respect the law and to obey the law than another it is you and I and other gentlemen, officials of the Government, who have taken a special oath to obey and support the Constitution and the law. [Applause.] So the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW] urged that Members of this House and other high officials should obey and support the Constitution. Then my friend from Maryland [Mr. HILL] made his speech filled with evidence of irritation in his gentle system because of this appeal for the enforcement of the law, and he called attention to a resolution that he has for an investigation of Mr. UPSHAW and his speech, of things he said Mr. UPSHAW has said that might disturb Members of the House or reflect upon them. I will refer no more to my friend from Maryland just now other than to call to his attention another speech made by another Member of this House, and I hope he will broaden his resolution to have an investigation made of it at the same time he investigates what Mr. UPSHAW said.

In the St. Louis Globe-Democrat of Wednesday morning, May 10, 1922, Congressman HILL, of Maryland, is reported as making this statement:

There is nobody as thirsty as a prohibition Congressman.

[Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will permit, let me read the other one also. If the gentleman will permit, I have only 10 minutes in which to correct an awful lot of errors. I do not want to be discourteous. The gentleman's resolution drawn as I suggest will accomplish all he desires. I read:

HILL told of communications sent by Wayne Wheeler to Congressmen who vote as he desires. "He doesn't send them to me," he said, "but I have a friend who lets me see them in return for an occasional drink. There is nothing so thirsty as some prohibition Congressmen. I have had to quit keeping liquor in my office because so many of the prohibition Congressmen came to see me that I had none left for my wet friends.

[Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I regret that I can not. I want to be courteous. The gentleman is so considerate of the reputation of his colleagues that he was willing last May to spread that broadcast throughout the country from some place out in Missouri. Then our friend, the distinguished Member of the House from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], has spoken to us in the very interesting, polished, and eloquent manner with which he always delights the House. He spoke of "the soul of truth," the difficulty of finding it in the mass of error. It occurred to me, as I heard the gentleman from New York, how error itself—plain, unvarnished, vulgar error—could be taken by one so gifted with eloquence and presented as though it were truth itself. [Applause.] The gentleman from New York urged that the eighteenth amendment must be nullified. He solicits its nullification on the ground that no law should be enforced in any community unless it accords with the desires and appetites of that community. And still he turns with horror to Louisiana. If no law is to be enforced in any community unless it conforms to the appetites and desires of that community, the converse is true, that that community can enforce as its will what it wishes to be the law of that community. [Applause.] How could it be said by the gentleman from New York in his eloquent presentation of error, if that is correct, where can there be ground for criticism because some community of Louisiana sought in a horrible way to execute what was the sentiment of that community but not the law of the State or the Nation? Oh, how did we enforce the draft in time of war? Did we say to these communities at that time, "If this law suits you, send your boys to the war?" No. We passed a law affecting every community in this country. We can also require in time of peace that there be loyalty to the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.] I say that the normal mission of this great democracy is not war but peace, and that both in war and in peace we must defend our Constitution and the things that democracy stands for. But the gentleman argues that in war only, an abnormal period which is only subsidiary to times of peace, we can require subordination from every citizen and not in time of peace, and that each community can act by itself and a little community may defy the Nation. My little town in Michigan has as much right as the great city of New York to defy the Constitution of the United States. But that is no right at all for his town or for mine.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRAMTON. I regret I can not yield. I will yield only for an express denial or confirmation of the statement I quoted from the gentleman, not for a statement.

Mr. HILL. I want to ask you——

Mr. CRAMTON. I decline to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan declines to yield.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman urges that prohibition fails to prohibit and then lends his eloquence and his prestige to the nation-wide effort to cause it to fail. He says the eighteenth amendment—the prohibition amendment to the Constitution—is repugnant to the spirit of our institutions. If I understand the lesson that the fathers of the Republic drew from history, it was that in all history those who have controlled a government have always controlled it primarily in their own interest, and so they established here a government in which all should control the government, in order that the welfare and happiness of all might be the chief concern of that government. "Oh," he says, "it should be a government in which I am to have the liberty to go wrong." Yes; but God forbid that this democracy, founded to secure the happiness and welfare of all alike—God forbid that that government should have a part in establishing all over the country institutions to help men to go wrong. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, may I have two minutes more?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman from Mississippi is very kind. Overlooking some other things I thought to say—and I have put a whole speech into the discard to take this up—the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL] is the chosen spokesman here of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, with headquarters at Baltimore. Their platform is "to get the Volstead Act out of the law and keep it out" and "endeavor to have the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment left to the several States." Well, he, as their spokesman—and likewise the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], where the same association is much in evidence—are seeking to destroy the Volstead Act, the Federal enforcement act. There is in Maryland no State law whatever for the enforcement of the prohibition law. [Applause.] Yes; the gentleman from Maryland, who applauds, he and his friends oppose the enactment of any law in Maryland in reference to this. In the State of New York the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] indorses the program of his party to repeal the State enforcement act.

Gentlemen of the House, the issue is clear before the country. On the one hand there are those who are friends of the eighteenth amendment and of law and order, who seek a strong Federal statute to cooperate with their State laws where they are available.

We have the opposition of such gentlemen here as would repeal the Volstead Act and would obstruct the passage of any State law for its enforcement. On the one hand it is law and order, with the Constitution supreme. On the other hand it is disorder, anarchy, nullification of the Constitution. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the subject of farm credits is one of the important matters that I think it is practically agreed upon shall be determined, in so far as possible, by the present session of Congress. Some time ago we established a Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, composed of Members of the House and of the Senate, who entered into a most complete examination of the whole question of farm credits, and in a general way this is the result of their conclusions: They found that we had fairly satisfactory provisions of law by which long-time farm-loan credits were provided, and that under such provisions there had been a considerable reduction of interest, and that the system itself was fairly satisfactory, but recommended some amendments, which are now being considered and which will doubtless be passed upon before this session of Congress ends. The long-time credits extend from 3 or 5 years to from 30 to 35 years. Then we have, through the Federal reserve system, commercial credits which extend from 90 days to 6 months in some instances. This provides for the farmer as well as for the business man what may be called and classed as commercial credits. But the intervening period between the six months of the commercial credits and the long-time farm loans is not covered, and no provision is made with regard to it. This commission and all the farm organizations and probably most of the farmers of the United States join in asking that this omission be cured by this Congress. A bill was prepared which provided for a system of intermediate credits. It was introduced in the Senate by Senator LENROOT and in the House has been introduced by Mr. ANDERSON. It is a very complete bill and covers the subject in a way generally satisfactory. However, there are some difficulties with regard to the bill that ought perhaps to be considered by the House before they come to the consideration of the bill itself.

The main objection to the bill as it was introduced consists in the fact that the intermediate farm-credit system can be neither considered as a commercial system—and ought not, therefore, to be committed to the Federal reserve system—nor altogether considered as a farm-land loan system. Although the bill which was introduced in the House by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] and in the Senate by Senator LENROOT carries the control of the intermediate system which they propose by the Federal Farm Loan Board, it was recognized by all who have given careful thought to the question that that probably ought not to be done if it can be avoided. The farm-loan system, based upon mortgages on real estate, is an entirely different proposition in its essentials from the intermediate credit system, which must neither be commercial in its nature nor be founded on mortgages or long-time loans on real estate security. In this bill there is proposed a system of securities and guaranties which perhaps will be fairly satisfactory. The general system for intermediate credits is very much like the system of long-time farm-loan credits, but the security is different. The debentures and bonds, if you may so call them, which are to secure the money that is to be loaned by this intermediate credit system, will be a different class of securities. They will require a different method of adjustment and a different method of administration. So it has been proposed and very strongly advocated by some of our agricultural associations, especially the Farm Bureau, that there should be a different board for passing upon the intermediate credit system, and this has been formulated into what may be considered as amendments to the original Anderson bill.

It was thought, however, that if the changes proposed were introduced as amendments their relation to the system could not be well understood or fully considered, and that the changes proposed could be better understood and considered if a bill embodying the proposed changes could be presented for consideration. This has been done, and yesterday I introduced a bill which carries the changes proposed, and it is now H. R. 13806. This bill in general terms provides that there shall be an intermediate farm-credit board which shall consider and pass upon this particular class of credits. However, the act is not to be administered by separate organizations, but the administration of the act is committed to the Federal land banks scattered throughout the United States. The changes from the Anderson bill may be said to relate to the primary administration of the act, to the management of the ultimate securities, to the determination of those things that constitute the foundation upon which not only the loans shall be made but also the foundation and the security upon which the bonds are to rest that are to be issued to secure the funds for the system. So I have introduced this bill, and I ask the careful attention of those who are interested, and I hope all will be interested in this proposition before we are to consider—as I hope we will soon consider—the question of legislation for intermediate farm credits in connection with the bill introduced by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit as a part of my remarks, under the permission given me, a statement regarding the matter which has been prepared by the Farm Bureau Federation, and ask that it be considered as a part of my remarks.

The statement is as follows:

BRIEF FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A SEPARATE FEDERAL BOARD TO ADMINISTER INTERMEDIATE CREDITS ACT.

There are only three solutions offered to the problem of administering the intermediate credits act. The first is to have this function through the Federal reserve system; second, to have it function through the Farm Loan Board; and third, to set up a separate board which shall supervise the working of the system.

The difficulties in extending this credit directly through the Federal reserve system are such that this method has been practically abandoned as a solution.

The Farm Loan Board has an entirely complete and separate function to perform. Their activities are solely connected with the safety of loans based on the absolute security of land values over a long period. If the intermediate credit system is to serve agriculture in advancing credits for production and orderly marketing of crops and the raising of live stock, it must be administered from an entirely different viewpoint than that under which loans based on land values over long periods of years are made. Furthermore, nothing should be done to in any way complicate the issuing of the Federal farm loan bonds based on this real estate, and a distinct difference should be made between the Federal farm loan bonds and the debentures or bonds to be sold on the basis of intermediate credit security. The two systems should be kept as distinct as possible.

We have attempted in the proposed amendments to the Lenroot-Anderson bill to utilize the already established Federal land banks for the purpose of the distribution of this credit, and at the same time provide a new head, which we have called the Federal farm credit board, which will supervise this new system of intermediate credits.

On page 2 of the bill, section 2, the Federal farm loan act is amended so that it "may be cited as the Federal farm loan and credit act." Then, we have left the administration of the act as set forth in Title I under the direction and control of the Federal Farm Loan Board, as it now stands, but we have placed the administration of the act under Title II, which deals exclusively with the intermediate credit act, under the direction and control of the Federal farm loan credit board.

Then, in section 3, on page 2, we have further amended the Federal farm loan act by inserting two additional sections, sections 201 and 203, and section 201 as set out in the Lenroot-Anderson bill then becomes section 203. Section 201 provides for the establishment of the Federal farm credit bureau, under the supervision of the Federal farm credit board, and the new board has been set up in exactly the same way as the Federal Farm Loan Board was set up, with such changes as make it deal with the new credit system. The Federal land banks shall report to this board a schedule showing the salaries or rates of compensation paid to the officers and employees of its farm credits department, and the Federal farm credit board will require examinations and report of the condition of the farm credit departments of the land banks and prescribe a standard form for the statement of the conditions of these farm credit departments.

Then, in section 202 we have provided for joint sessions of the Farm Loan Board and the farm credit board, to be called at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury or at the request of three members of said boards. This authority to hold a joint session is created for the primary purpose of allocating the expense to the proper board arising from the establishment of the farm credits departments of the various Federal land banks, but there may be other emergencies arising which jointly affect both systems which would require such a joint session.

Following these two new sections, we have kept exclusively to the wording of the Lenroot-Anderson bill, simply changing the jurisdiction of the farm credits department as set up in the Federal land banks from the Federal Farm Loan Board to the Federal farm credit board, and these are the only changes, other than the renumbering of the sections, until we come to section 203, new section 205, on page 6, line 11, when the $5,000,000 capital is increased to $10,000,000.

Section 204, on page 7, new section 206, provides for the joint session of the two boards to equitably apportion the joint expenses incurred, and further provides that the Federal farm credit board shall assess this expense so determined against the farm credits department; and in line 14 on this page strike out the words "any additional personnel in" as unnecessary under the changed supervision.

In line 19, page 7, we have provided that the capital stock held by the Government shall be entitled to no dividends; this is in accord with the present farm-loan system, and we see no reason why the credit departments should be handicapped by this expense, which is not assessed against the farm-loan system.

We realize that the particular objection that may be raised to this solution of the problem by those who have not familiarized themselves fully with the activities and functions provided in the act would be that we are creating two masters for the Federal farm-loan system. This criticism is not borne out by an examination of the functions of the separate departments in that, while the facilities of the Federal land banks are utilized, entirely distinct and separate departments with distinct and separate functions are set up in this bill, and in no way are their activities associated with those of the Federal land banks in their long-time mortgage lease but deal solely with the new intermediate credit system; consequently there is no overlapping in the Federal land banks, and the new board set up in Washington has absolutely no jurisdiction over the activities of the Federal land bank with regard to the long-time loans, nor does the farm-loan system have any jurisdiction over the farm-credit departments of the Federal land banks; so that we have two distinct and separate systems, simply functioning through the one existing agency, the Federal land banks. It is difficult to give any credence to the argument that such joint activity can not function properly when an examination of our present Federal reserve system shows a complete analogy of our proposed plans. For instance, the Federal reserve bank has two distinct functions to perform. One is that of a fiscal agency, and the other is its banking function. These Federal reserve banks, acting as fiscal agency, are directly and completely under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Federal Reserve Board has nothing to do with the fiscal agency in the Federal reserve bank. The other function of the Federal reserve bank is its banking function, which is directly under the control of the Federal Reserve Board, and the Secretary of the Treasury has nothing to say with regard to the banking functions of the Federal reserve bank. There are two separate and distinct functions of the Federal reserve banks, reporting to two separate and distinct heads. When we carry this further down to the national bank member we find that it is under the control of two separate and distinct heads, namely, under the Federal reserve bank and, also, it is supervised by and reports to the Comptroller of the Currency.

Furthermore, a State bank which is a member of the Federal reserve system is under the control both of the Federal reserve bank and under the State banking department of the State in which it operates, yet no one would hold that the Federal reserve system is handicapped by the fact that it is operating under distinct and separate heads, which it is.

We believe we have shown that this proposed solution is entirely feasible, is simple, and is preferable to the overlapping system which throws a double function on the Farm Loan Board, and the advantages are many.

When the character of the loans is carefully considered it must be remembered that they are so distinct and so different in their purposes that it would be difficult to supervise these joint systems under one head.

We further suggest, though we have not included as an amendment to the bill, that a Treasury credit should be provided for the use of the credit board which will be sufficient to enable the credit board to augment the credits in the districts as the need arises and will further provide the credit board with a substantial support when dealing in bank acceptances.

Mr. SISSON. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WRIGHT]. [Applause.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I doubt if the gravity and seriousness and far-reaching effects of the destruction wrought by the ravages of the boll weevil in the South are very fully and generally appreciated. The boll weevil entered the United States from Mexico in 1892, and in 30 years has spread over the entire cotton belt, except the extreme northern boundaries of the cotton territory in Missouri and Tennessee. The official records of the United States Department of Agriculture show that from 1916 to 1920, inclusive, the boll weevil had destroyed each year from two and one-half to three million bales of cotton. In 1921 the quantity of cotton destroyed by the weevil, according to Government statistics, was over 6,000,000 bales, and in 1922 near that figure. In 1920 this country produced over 13,000,000 bales. In 1921 it made not quite 8,000,000 bales, and the crop of 1922 ginned up to January 1, 1923, was 9,598,907 bales, which practically includes the entire crop of 1922. In the past six or seven years, taking the average price of cotton, the producers have lost over $1,000,000,000 on account of the ravages of the boll weevil.

I venture to read some excerpts from letters which I have from constituents in my district and in the immediate section in which I live. I read from a letter written by Hon. J. P. Jones, sr., under date of December 13, 1922:

* * * The agricultural conditions in the remote rural districts are the worst that I have ever seen them since the days immediately following the Civil War. The average farmer in this section has not made cotton enough without the use of calcium arsenate to pay for the fertilizers he used. The average has been from one-half to one and one-half bales to the plow. * * * I can't see how the average farmer can make another crop at all next year. I have lost $30,000 the past three years trying to hold and to care for my tenants and stock, hoping that conditions would change and react for the better. I will mention one illustration, and all others apply in the same proportion. The mule dealers in Newnan told me that there have usually been about 25 carloads of good young mules shipped to Newnan annually before the wreck hit us; but this year not a single carload has been received there. But on the contrary, this year 15 carloads of the best mules in the country have been shipped away from Newnan. * * *

I now come to the second item of your inquiry—calcium arsenate and the methods of using it. I had 10 tenants this year who did not use calcium arsenate at all, and all they made won't pay for the fertilizers they used, which is a fair sample of this whole section where no poison was used. My boys and myself cultivated 250 acres in cotton with wages labor, and used calcium arsenate on all of it, strictly according to the instructions of our State board of entomology, applying it five to six times during July and August, using 25 to 30 pounds during the whole season per acre, each separate application being about 5 to 6 pounds per acre. We made five to six times more cotton per acre than any of our neighbors who did not use the poison. But for the unfavorable weather conditions here in July and August, we would have made a full crop. You know this was a very unfavorable year in this section for cotton.

I don't think the boll weevils damaged our crop but very little. If we had not made one mistake, by commencing with the poison two weeks too late, I don't think we would have had scarcely any boll weevils. We commenced using the poison July 1 when we ought to have commenced June 15. The board of entomology instructed us to wait for a 10 or 15 per cent infection, whereas we had 100 per cent infection to start with.

I fought boll weevils this year all day and night, and learned a great deal about their habits and methods of operation, and I expect to be more successful next year than I was this year. * * * The machine for applying the poison is a very simple little machine covering two rows at a time, and ought not to cost over $10 or $12, and yet I had to pay $55 for every one I used. One machine will take care of 30 or 40 acres during one season. The dealers, who have the exclusive right to sell these machines in the State, made this year over $50,000 profits on their sales, and would have doubled that if they could have gotten the machines. Such an outrage ought not to be allowed by the laws of the country against an agricultural people struggling for their existence. * * *

My boys and myself have made and ginned more cotton from our farm where we used the calcuim arsenate than the public gin at Whitesbury has ginned in a circumference with a diameter of 6 or 7 miles around Whitesburg, where formerly they have been ginning 2,000 to 2,500 bales. The calcium arsenate I used this year was bought through the State board of entomology for 9 cents per pound f. o. b. Atlanta, Ga. The manufacturers have already contracted with the speculators for every pound they can make between now and the time for use next summer, and they won't sell a pound to anybody else. The prevailing price now f. o. b. is 15 to 18 cents per pound, and I expect by next season it will be 20 cents and perhaps more. * * *

* * * * * * *

In explanation I wish to say that in the Cotton Belt they speak about the size of a farm by the number of plows. The number of acres of an average plow is 20 to 30, 25 being the average acres. Formerly in a good cotton-producing section the average production a plow was 8 to 20 bales.

I also read some extracts from a letter from Mr. James S. Peters, of Manchester, Ga.:

* * * * * * * *

* * * Meriwether County once produced upward of 25,000 bales of cotton and our crop this year will fall below 6,000 bales. Talbot County, just to our south, is in a worse condition, and I am likewise informed that this is true about Harris. Much of the lands in these counties has been abandoned and the labor has either left the farms or gone North. It would be hard to tell you in a letter the conditions of the farmers in this section; however, you will get a very good idea when I tell you that few of our farmers are able to pay the interest on their indebtedness, borrow money at the banks, or buy supplies on terms; of course, you will find some exceptions among the more thrifty.

I have been trying to grow cotton for the past six years in the face of the boll weevil, and sometimes I get despondent; however, I expect to try again the coming year, and will try the following plan: It is my purpose to prepare the land as early as possible; fertilize, using about 400 to 600 pounds of high-grade fertilizer to the acre; plant shallow; and cultivate likewise as rapidly as possible. As soon as the leaves begin to show up I expect to begin spraying with a hand duster and continue as long as the weather conditions are favorable or the cotton gets large enough that spraying is impractical. This plan, in my opinion, on average land should produce from 500 to 1,000 pounds of cotton; on average land the variation, as you will note, is large and is a result of weather conditions.

* * * * * * *

This year we were able to secure arsenate at 9 cents per pound, and, in my opinion, we can very well afford to exchange 1 pound of lint cotton for 2 pounds of calcium arsenate, and when the price goes above this, whether or not it will pay depends upon too many conditions to mention; however, I might say that intelligence, soil, and weather conditions will in a large measure determine the result.

In thinking over the situation it looks now like spraying will eventually represent about the same outlay in making a crop as heretofore expended on fertilizer, and the cost of applying it will be heavier than the expense of scattering the fertilizer. The cost of the spray machines ranges from $15 for a hand machine to $275 for a power machine. * * *

* * * * * * *

I have several other letters along the same line. I want to read some extracts from a letter from Mr. H. H. North, of my city, president of the Manufacturers' National Bank there:

* * * * * * * *

* * * I beg to say that Coweta's normal crop was about 30,000 bales per annum; a few years it was much larger. I think the crop of 1919 was in the neighborhood of 32,000 bales. We had very few weevils that year. In 1920 the weevil appeared in what we considered a small way, and our crop that year was about 18,000 bales. In 1921 we had in the neighborhood of 8,000 bales, and the present year it will not much exceed 3,000 bales. This year's crop was made, but in a few instances, without the use of fertilizer or poison, as both of these commodities were sold only for cash and our farmers were so disheartened that very few of them used either. Every farmer who used good fertilizers and poison, as directed by the Agricultural Department, profited by it very much. * * *

* * * * * * * *

In regard to the condition of the farmers in this section brought about by the destruction of the cotton crop caused by the boll weevil, I can hardly describe it to you. You know our people so well. They have never been extravagant, but it is deplorable to see people who were the backbone of our country, and who held their obligations on a parity with their religion, placed in a position from the disaster wrought by the boll weevil that unless we can successfully raise cotton again will never be able to pay their debts. However, they are making every sacrifice and are ready now to make any application worked out by the Government to fight the boll weevil.

One of the worst features that I see in our present condition is the decline in our rural institutions. Our schools are declining and our farming population is barely able to support the churches. However, they are making every sacrifice to do this.

* * * The calcium arsenate prices quoted to us have been carload lots, 17 cents per pound; less than carload lots, 18 to 19 cents per pound. * * * This seems to be a pretty stiff advance from 9 cents per pound last year. The prices on the dusting machines were last year $18 for the hand machine and $55 for the mule-back duster, which carried two rows at a time. * * *

The present prices of arsenate and the machines, I am afraid, will keep a great many of our smaller farmers from using the poison another year, but they all seem anxious to use it, and I believe would give it a pretty thorough tryout if it were possible for them to do so. The banks would be very willing to furnish sufficient arsenate and the machines, but at the present prices and with the amount of fertilizer, that would have to be paid for cash, sufficient to make a crop, and the other necessary expenses, it would make an advance that we would be a little slow in furnishing except to people who have sufficient supplies and cash to make their crops above the expenses of poison and fertilizers.

* * * * * * *

I also have a letter from Mr. A. A. Reese, who in a very practical way points out the benefit resulting from the use of calcium arsenate, and some extracts from this letter are as follows:

* * * * * * *

The State board is at variance with the United States office of Louisiana in some respects. But the only one of much importance is the time to begin with the poison. Our board claims that the time to put it on is when the weevils first begin, and that is before the cotton has any squares, or fruit. The weevil commences in the young, tender bud of the stalk as soon as he comes out of his winter quarters. Now, I contend that I did the best work of the year by dusting the little cotton in the top just as soon as I chopped out to a stand and plowed it. The weevils were very numerous and sucking the bud, as that was all they could feed upon at that time. I got the first crop that came out of winter quarters before I had any fruit, or squares, on my cotton. I dusted this small cotton with little sacks that my wife made for me. I had her make about 100 of these. I will send you one. It is made of bedticking with a cheesecloth bottom, and the little negroes can go over an acre every two hours. I used the sack for two or three applications, because I could work the women and children and keep my plow hands and mules to the plow. Now, after the cotton begins to be full of squares and blooms the dusting machines are best.

Now for the Government's advice—I mean from the Louisiana office. They claim not to poison in the early season, not even at all until you have squares and blooms, and then wait until you see 15 or 20 per cent infestation. They claim we waste the arsenate and throw away our time by the early applications. I contend that is the best time to kill the weevil, because he must eat to live, and he can only live by eating the bud of the plant. I had two croppers that never did have any squares to pick up from the ground or off the stalk for no other reason than that they poisoned at the time to get the first crop of weevils as they came out. "A stitch in time saves nine." The first application should be as light as you can put it. I mean by that, just so you can see the dust in the top of the bud. And, too, that is enough at any time to dust, an amount that will show the dust all over the foliage. I used more than necessary this year, but had to learn.

Now, if you can put 1 to 2 pounds to acre for first application is sufficient. Then increase 1 pound per acre as the stalks grow larger. My plan this year will be 1½ to 2 pounds per acre, first application. Second application three weeks from first with 3 pounds per acre. If no rain for 24 hours after second application, wait two weeks for third and put 4 pounds per acre. Then, about same time, 5 pounds per acre; then, about same time, 6 pounds per acre; then, about same time, 7 pounds per acre.

Notice, now, I said if no rain within 24 hours after application to wait. But if it rained hard enough to wash off the dust, I would put on earlier. Now, here is how to tell: Go in the field. Count 100 squares on one row in same place; take 10 rows until you count 1,000. As you count pick off infested squares and hold in your hand until you count the 1,000. Now deduct the infested or punctured squares you found while counting the 1,000 and you have the percentage of infestation.

For instance: First 100 you have 2—2 per cent; second 100 you have 1—1 per cent; third 100 you have 5—5 per cent; fourth 100 you have 4—4 per cent; fifth 100 you have 3—3 per cent.

In 500 you have 15 punctured of 100, or 15 per cent.

* * * * * * *

I wish to say just here that all of us used too much arsenate. We thought the stalk had to be white with it. But that is not the way. Just enough to see the dust by looking closely is all that is necessary, and will do as much good as ten times that amount. Some of our farmers used 50 pounds per acre this year. I used 25 to 35 pounds. And am going to make a crop next year on less, if the rains do not interfere too much. I only made about 30 bales last year, 1921, without arsenate. This year I reduced my acreage and bought $450 worth of arsenate. I have ginned 85 or 90 bales for this year with less guano. My plan for next year is 400 to 500 pounds of fertilizer per acre and about 25 to 30 pounds of arsenate. I am going after 150 bales of cotton for 1923.

* * * * * * *

Our arsenate cost us 9 cents per pound, bought through our State board for 1922. As yet they have not been able to contract for 1923. * * * It was hard to get for 1921. Some farmers could not get any at all.

* * * * * * *

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. I will.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I understand the Senate has passed a resolution providing $10,000,000 for the purchase of nitrate of soda and calcium arsenate. That is now before the Agricultural Committee. Does the gentleman think that that would be a good thing to aid the farmer in getting calcium arsenate?

Mr. WRIGHT. I will come to that presently. I thank the gentleman for calling attention to it. Now, gentlemen, as a farmer I know something about the customs and ravages of the boll weevil. I believe the best method of fighting the boll weevil is this: First of all, for the southern farmer to produce an abundant supply of foodstuff and feed stuff for his farm. Then to plant 5 or 10 acres to the plow in cotton and let the land be very fertile, the very best of the land. Prepare it thoroughly, plant it early, use the best seed, one that will mature the earliest, fertilize it heavily, cultivate it intensively and intelligently apply the calcium arsenate, and in an ordinary year if the seasons are reasonably favorable some cotton can be produced.

I want to say in that connection that some years in some sections a fairly good crop might be produced without the use of calcium arsenate, because if the summer is long and dry and the crop is properly fertilized and cultivated some cotton can be produced. But in the Cotton Belt, as a rule, it is unsafe to undertake the production of cotton without the use of calcium arsenate. It is the only remedy which the Department of Agriculture has discovered to effectively destroy the weevil after many years of research and experimentation.

So, you see, fertilizer and calcium arsenate are needed in the Cotton Belt. But the South is not the only section that uses fertilizer. It is used in the East and in the Northwest and the West, but it is more generally used throughout the Cotton Belt than in any other section of the United States. Now, the Senate of the United States last Saturday passed a joint resolution creating a revolving fund of $10,000,000, and authorizing the President to purchase with it sodium nitrate and calcium arsenate.

You ask my attitude about that. If that resolution comes before the House I will support it. I believe it would be a good thing for it to pass. Of course, there is a principle in legislation of that kind that ordinarily I would not stand for, but growing out of the emergency that confronts us and the gravity of the situation, I will support the resolution gladly.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I understand the purpose is to buy it and furnish it to the farmers at cost, so that it will not cost the Government anything.

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. I will.

Mr. GARNER. I notice the gentleman said in one of the letters it stated that the machine that they were selling for $55 ought to be sold for $15. Had we not better amend the resolution and give the farmers the machine at cost, so that they will not pay these profiteers a $40 bonus?

Mr. WRIGHT. I think that would be a good idea, but when you start that kind of legislation the gentleman knows there is no end to it.

But I want to go on record as emphatically supporting the joint resolution adopted by the Senate for the purchase of calcium arsenate and nitrate of soda.

Mr. GARNER. About how much calcium arsenate is used in the course of a year in the way of eradicating the boll weevil?

Mr. WRIGHT. It is practically a new question and the statistics are difficult to obtain. The truth is there are not over fifteen to sixteen thousand tons available in the United States, and not over 8,000 of those are available for agriculture.

Mr. GARNER. How much would the 8,000 tons be worth at the market price?

Mr. WRIGHT. I believe the highest price at which I have heard it quoted is 20 cents a pound.

Mr. GARNER. Then you only need about $500,000 to buy that.

Mr. WRIGHT. Five or six hundred thousand dollars I undertake to say will purchase all of the calcium arsenate in existence available in the United States to-day.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Is it not the purpose of the resolution to protect the farmer against the profiteer in this absolutely necessary article to destroy the boll weevil?

Mr. WRIGHT. I think that is one of the principal elements involved.

Mr. GARNER. Do I understand that the principal thing to be gained by the resolution which the Senate passed is to enable the President to go into the business of purchasing calcium arsenate and to distribute it, to prevent profiteering?

Mr. WRIGHT. To make it available to the farmer. Of course, the farmer must pay the Government the full cost of it to the Government in cash.

Mr. GARNER. Is it not available if he has the money to buy it?

Mr. WRIGHT. The truth is that it is coming into such general use that, being comparatively scarce in this country, the profiteers and the speculators have exploited it, and cornered it, so that it is commanding a price wholly out of proportion to its intrinsic value.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. I agree with the gentleman that the trouble is that there is a limited supply of it because there has been a limited demand, but this new use of it has made the demand so unlimited that the men with money find it profitable to buy it and charge unreasonable prices for it.

Mr. WRIGHT. That is the point that I make. They have cornered it, knowing the supply of the article and the demand for it. I am strongly in favor of the use of calcium arsenate, and in favor of the use of nitrate of soda, and those are some of the things I have in my mind in making these brief remarks. Let us take the question of nitrate of soda. The farmers of this country use only about 250,000 tons of Chilean nitrate. That is all that is available to them. The Government of the United States owns quite a supply of it down at Old Hickory, in the State of Tennessee. It has been there I presume for several years. The sacks have become eaten and are in somewhat bad condition. It is stored in warehouses. They had a sale a few weeks ago of 25,000 tons of it. I believe the average price at which it was sold was $47 a ton. They are now offering 28,000 tons for sale on the 30th of this month at the same point, Old Hickory, Tenn. If the $10,000,000 revolving fund is to be created for the purchase of nitrate of soda, it would seem a shortsighted policy for the Government to sell the surplus of this material it already has on hand and then go into the market and rebuy it. Of course, whoever purchases the surplus stock at Old Hickory or other points would want a profit on it if resold. It would seem that some provision should be made whereby this surplus stock of nitrate now owned by the Government should be handled or sold in such quantities as that the farmers of the country could buy it and thus let it be devoted to the production of crops, so much needed. Nitrate of soda is now commanding a pretty good price, but if you will take the 250,000 tons that are consumed by the farmers of the country and multiply that by $45 a ton you will see that $10,000,000 would nearly buy all that is annually imported into this country for the use of the farmers. Two things that the cotton planter needs to-day are fertilizer and calcium arsenate. Where do we get this nitrate of soda? It is imported from Chile, and in what way?

England controls three-fourths of those Chilean nitrate mines. What are we doing in this country? England transports coal in her ships from England and from Germany to Chile with which to operate those Chilean mines. By the time the coal is transported and the power generated by it is furnished to the nitrate mines the cost of mining it is about $8 a ton, and then when it leaves Chile to come to the United States the Chilean Government exacts an export duty of over $12 a ton, so that before it ever leaves the coast of Chile en route to the United States it has cost over $20 a ton. It has to go through the Panama Canal, and what do we do there? The American farmer helped to pay for that canal, and he is compelled to pay the toll to have this nitrate go through that canal. While we spend billions of dollars for Chilean nitrate, do you know that to-day down at Muscle Shoals, in the State of Alabama, there is standing idle and at great cost to the Government a nitrate plant built by this Government which is capable of producing 40,000 tons of fixed nitrogen annually, which is equivalent to every pound of Chilean nitrate which the farmers consume? Forty thousand tons of fixed nitrogen is the equivalent of 250,000 tons of Chilean nitrate imported into this country and used by the farmers. From the air over one acre of land there can be fixed 33,880 tons of nitrogen, and the supply is inexhaustible, as it is replenished in the air. Not only this, but nitrogen and fertilizers can be economically produced at this wonderful plant at Muscle Shoals and so that as a result of the operation of the plant the farmers of this country would be saved an almost incalculable amount during the 100-year period which Mr. Ford, in his offer, obligates the company to be formed to operate this plant. Mr. Thomas A. Edison, who has studied the question, gives it as his opinion that fertilizers can be produced at Muscle Shoals at about half the price at which they are now sold.

It should also be kept in mind that with 40,000 tons of fixed nitrogen a mixed, well balanced fertilizer can be made aggregating 2,000,000 tons.

Mr. GARNER. Then, if we could get the Ford proposition supported by our friends on the other side, we would only have to have $500,000 in order to get the other.

Mr. WRIGHT. In order to relieve the entire situation. So that we are in this attitude: For more than a year and a half Henry Ford has had pending a proposition to take over this wonderful plant, to operate it to its full capacity. As early as June of last year a bill was reported to this House by a Republican committee of this House favoring the acceptance of the Ford offer, and yet not one move has been made toward the passage of that bill or making it possible for this great project to be turned over to Mr. Ford.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Why? What is it that is standing in the way of Congress passing on this matter? I thought perhaps the gentleman would tell the people of the country.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will tell what I think about it. I believe that the great banks and trust companies of this country are fighting Mr. Ford's offer. I believe the great automobile concerns of the country are fighting it; that the great water-power companies of the country are fighting it; that the great fertilizer trusts are fighting it. I believe that practically every big industry and financial concern in the United States are fighting the Henry Ford offer.

Mr. GARNER. But probably the most important one is the gentleman who sits at the other end of the Avenue.

Mr. WRIGHT. Perhaps the gentleman is correct.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Does not the gentleman know that I filed a report against the Henry Ford offer, in which I gave my reasons?

Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly; the gentleman filed a very able report. He is as much entitled to his views as any other Member of the House. In addition to that, I believe that if this great project were turned over to Henry Ford under his offer in addition to the manufacture of nitrogen and fertilizers at Muscle Shoals he would begin the manufacture of calcium arsenate.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman knows, I am very much in favor of Mr. Ford having Muscle Shoals, but I would like him to tell the House on what authority he bases that statement that if Mr. Ford had the contract he would also manufacture calcium arsenate?

Mr. WRIGHT. I am not authorized to speak for Mr. Ford; but I say this to my colleague, that I have personally taken this matter up with the representative of Henry Ford, Mr. W. B. Mayo, and suggested to him the possibility of manufacturing calcium arsenate at Muscle Shoals as well as fertilizers, and also the manufacture of machines there which could be supplied to the farmers at reasonable prices to distribute this calcium arsenate, and he is intensely interested in it and is now actively engaged in working on the question to determine whether it is practical to manufacture calcium arsenate at Muscle Shoals.

It would seem, however, of doubtful propriety to ask Mr. Ford if he would manufacture calcium arsenate at Muscle Shoals, as his offer thus far has been ignored, and he might very properly ask this House what it proposed to do in reference to his present offer, which has been pending so long. I firmly believe if this great plant at Muscle Shoals should be turned over to him under his offer he would gladly manufacture calcium arsenate there as well as fertilizers. I believe he would do this not only because of the interest he has manifested in the prosperity of this country but because if for no other reason from a selfish standpoint. Henry Ford knows as well as any man living he can not sell trucks, tractors, and cars through the South unless there is a production of cotton. He knows without the use of fertilizer and calcium arsenate that cotton can not be successfully produced. I am persuaded that the manufacture of calcium arsenate at Muscle Shoals is entirely practicable. Upon the completion of Dam No. 2 an abundant supply of power will be available; that section abounds in unlimited supply of lime rock from which the best grade of lime can be produced, and if white arsenic can be secured, and it can be, certainly Mr. Ford is in a position to do so and thus all of the elements necessary to produce calcium arsenate could be easily brought together at the Muscle Shoals plant. It will be understood that pure lime and white arsenic are the necessary ingredients in the manufacture of calcium arsenate.

It occurs to me that while it is a fine proposition to create this revolving fund of $10,000,000 to buy nitrate of soda and calcium arsenate, that what we need in this country is production of both. It would seem the only present prospect of success along these lines is this offer of Henry Ford, an offer made by a man whose ability no one questions and whose offer is clear and explicit as to just what he will do for this country at Muscle Shoals if this vast property is turned over to him. Now, this is not a local question, it is not even a Cotton Belt question. It is national in its scope; indeed, I might say, it is world-wide. The South can not buy the splendid mules which are raised in Indiana, Missouri, and Illinois without the the production of cotton. The South can not buy the manufactured products of New England unless they can grow cotton. The South can not pay life insurance premiums and fire insurance premiums to the great companies in the East and North unless she can grow cotton. The great textile mills in New England can not run without cotton. Stop its production and the spindles are idle, thousands of persons thrown out of employment and the rich harvest of dividends cut off. And it is surprising to me that when this question comes up how many of my good friends from the East are opposing it. Now, my good friend, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER], who filed a minority report on the Muscle Shoals proposition. He is from the good State of New Jersey and he is opposed to the Ford offer. What section, my friend, has supported New Jersey or the East more than Georgia and the South. It is of mutual interest. You make certain things we want and we make certain things you want, and so it is with all sections.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. I will.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman himself, I believe, signed the minority report on the committee?

Mr. WRIGHT. I did.

Mr. HULL. Then the gentleman should not censure the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. WRIGHT. I did not. I stated he had as much right——

Mr. FIELDS. But there is a difference between the two minority reports.

Mr. WRIGHT. I filed a report accepting the Ford offer as finally passed up by the committee. The gentleman [Mr. HULL] signed the majority report, which recommended the passing of a piece of legislation through this House for Mr. Ford to do something he never offered to do and which we have no assurance he will ever do.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman will be fair with me.

Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman knows the reason I objected to the Ford offer was because it was to give him something we did not own; and as I look at it, that makes it an immoral act.

Mr. WRIGHT. He only proposed to take what interest the Government has in the Gorgas steam plant.

Mr. HULL. We have no right to give him something we do not own.

Mr. CRISP. Did not the legal adviser advise that the contract was not legally binding on the Government?

Mr. HULL. That may not be binding, but you can not transfer realty you do not own, and we did not own any realty within 90 miles of the Gorgas steam plant, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. CRISP. The proposition was simply to relegate the Government's interest, whatever that may be.

Mr. HULL. Let me ask this question.

Mr. WRIGHT. I hope this is not being taken out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. WRIGHT. The truth about it is the matter to which my friend from Iowa [Mr. HULL] refers was the Gorgas steam plant in which the Alabama Power Co. has an interest. There is no inconsistency in accepting the Ford offer just as he made it, including the Gorgas steam plant, because he only asked that whatever interest, and no more, that the Government has in that plant be transferred to him.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. Can a sovereign transfer a claim against another individual? Has it ever been done? If so, cite an instance.

Mr. WRIGHT. There is no doubt about the right of this Government to transfer whatever interest it does have in the Gorgas steam plant.

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WRIGHT. Can I have five additional minutes?

Mr. SISSON. If I had it I would be glad to give it to the gentleman. I will yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to add that white arsenic is produced in the United States as a by-product in the smelting of copper and other ores. Operations which have arsenic as their principal product were carried on during the high prices of the war years in Washington and in Virginia, but these operations were abandoned with the reduction in prices at the close of the war. In 1901 the production of white arsenic, according to the Geological Survey, the domestic production, reached its maximum of 11,502 tons. Added to which were imported 3,740 tons, making a total supply of 15,242 tons. In 1921, according to the Geological Survey, the domestic production fell off to 4,786 tons, while the imports were 1,699 tons, making a total supply of 6,455 tons.

The total production and importations for 1921, if wholly available for the production of calcium arsenate, would have produced about 16,140 tons of this material.

The price between 1901 and 1915 averaged about 2.8 cents per pound. In 1920 it reached about 8.8 cents per pound, and in 1921 it averaged 7.5 cents a pound, or about $150 per ton. Since about 800 pounds of white arsenic are required per ton of calcium arsenate manufactured, the cost of the white arsenic alone at this rate would be about $60 per ton of calcium arsenate. With large-scale production, having white arsenic as the principal product, the cost might be reduced.

Although there are about 130 minerals containing arsenic, there are 3 minerals which form the principal commercial supply of white arsenic obtained from operations in which arsenic is the principal product:

Arsenopyrite, or mispickle, is a mineral containing 46 per cent arsenic and consisting of arsenic, iron, and sulphur. It is the most widely distributed of any of the arsenic minerals. The second mineral is realgar, a sulphide of arsenic, containing approximately 70 per cent arsenic; and the third mineral is orpiment, also a sulphide of arsenic, containing about 61 per cent pure arsenic. Realgar and orpiment are "replacement minerals," occurring in veins and fissures, and not massive deposits.

There are no large deposits of arsenic ores in the United States that are being worked primarily for their arsenic content. Arsenopyrite occurs in limited quantities in 22 States from Maine to California. A small deposit has been worked in New York State, where it is found in a narrow vein; lenses of limited size and undetermined as to number, and varying from a few inches to 14 feet in thickness, have been worked in a small way in Floyd County, Va., during the period of war prices. Commercially important deposits have also been found in the Black Hills of South Dakota. The principal occurrences of orpiment in this country are a thin, unworked bed in the Mercur district in Utah and the Monte Cristo deposit in the State of Washington, which was worked in a temporary way during the war. Realgar is not mined in the United States.

The principal foreign deposits of arsenic ores occur at widely separated points, some of which are remote from civilization. While information is meager, large amounts of arsenic are reported by the British vice consul in Corsica to exist on that island in the form of realgar and orpiment. From a similar source reports are had of realgar deposits in the Hu-nan Province in China, near the Yangtze River. A deposit of orpiment, which has been mined to more or less extent, is in eastern Kurdistan, between the Caspian Sea and the Mediterranean Sea. Small amounts of arsenic ore are produced in France and southern Rhodesia, and manufactured white arsenic is produced in Great Britain, Australia, Canada, Greece, Japan, Spain, Portugal, and South Africa. Japan is said to have fairly large deposits of ores containing copper and lead carrying from 15 to 30 per cent arsenic. The production, however, is small, amounting to about 1,067 tons in 1919, of which 911 tons were exported to the United States. It has been estimated that the possible annual production from known sources in Japan would amount to about 4,000 tons of white arsenic per year.

Arsenic compounds are used in industries for making dyes and wood preservatives, and as a means of removing hair from hides in tanning; they are used to decolorize glass and to harden shot, and as an alloy to harden certain metals. Railroads use large quantities as a weed killer, and stock raisers also use considerable amounts in sheep dips for killing ticks and preventing foot rot. It is used as the basis of Paris green as an insecticide on valuable crops. Medicinally it is used in the form of "Fowler's solution" to fatten horses, and, although from two to four grains are fatal, it nevertheless has many valuable medicinal uses. White arsenic is on the free list, while calcium arsenate has an ad valorem of 25 per cent. This should be removed. The agricultural consumer of calcium arsenate in this country derives no benefit from the fact that white arsenic is on the free list if this arsenic is manufactured into calcium arsenate. It is wholly inconsistent to levy an ad valorem of 25 per cent on calcium arsenic and place white arsenic on the free list. The thing the American farmer needs is calcium arsenate and when he buys this he pays the equivalent of the 25 per cent ad valorem on the white arsenic whether it is imported or produced in this country, and the manufacturer of calcium arsenate gets the benefit of and profits by the 25 per cent ad valorem on white arsenic.

Gentlemen of the committee, referring to cotton—when I think about the cotton plant I am always reminded of the beautiful tribute that the lamented and now immortal Henry W. Grady paid when he was in the very prime and vigor of his career.

I want to read these lines. They were penned by Mr. Grady at a time when a normal production of cotton was being made throughout the Cotton Belt. They are as follows:

> What a royal plant it is! The world waits in attendance on its growth. The shower that falls whispering on its leaves is heard around the earth. The sun that shines on it is tempered by the prayers of all people. The frost that chills it and the dew that descends from the stars is noted, and the trespass of a little worm on its green leaf is more to England than the advance of the Russian Army on her Asian outposts
>
> It is gold from the instant it puts forth its tiny shoot. Its fiber is current in every bank, and when loosing its fleece to the sun it floats a banner that glorifies the field of the humble farmer. That man is marshaled under a flag that will compel the allegiance of the world and wring tribute from every nation on earth. It is the heritage that God gave to this people forever as their own when he arched our skies, established our mountains, girt us about with the ocean, loosed the breezes, tempered the sunshine, and measured the rain.
> Our's and our children's forever! As princely a talent as ever came from His hand to mortal stewardship.

[Applause.]

Gentlemen of the House, I say those beautiful lines that I have read were penned when the production of cotton was normal. Since then the industry has practically been destroyed by the ravages, not of a little worm on its foliage but by a brown, rusty bug known as the boll weevil. I am appealing to the House to-day, to men of all sections, to come to our relief and accept this Henry Ford offer and aid in recrowning cotton as king and in bringing prosperity to the country. [Applause.]

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I understand the gentleman is willing to take Henry Ford and grease him and swallow him whole? [Laughter.]

Mr. WRIGHT. I undertake to say to this House that I am in favor of accepting the Henry Ford offer for Muscle Shoals as reported in a bill that I introduced in this House last May or early in June last.

Mrs. HUCK rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the lady from Illinois rise?

Mrs. HUCK. I rise to ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the lady from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was the request of the gentleman from Georgia submitted.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

Mr. DEMPSEY. I understand Mr. NEWTON is willing to yield me his 15 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not customary for gentlemen who are yielded time to transfer their time. If it is agreeable to the chairman of the committee, I have no objection, but I have yielded to gentlemen who have taken up the time, and that will crowd me out of any time for myself. There are four gentlemen here who have each asked for an allowance of five minutes' time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RIVERS AND HARBORS.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill appropriates $37,000,000 for the improvement and maintenance of the rivers and harbors of the United States for the next fiscal year. The amendment proposes to increase this amount to $56,589,910. The sole issue, of course, is whether the increased appropriation named in the amendment is necessary.

The object of the appropriation is to increase the transportation facilities of the country. And there never was a time when this increase was so sorely needed as it is now. This fall, at Buffalo, at the foot of the Great Lakes, 20,000,000 bushels of wheat were tied up in the elevators, which were filled to overflowing, and even on vessels which were unable to start on their return trips because there was no place to receive the grain with which they were loaded. To-day, much of the wheat of the West is in the farmers' hands because they are unable to secure cars to transport it to market. All over the country there is a shortage of coal for manufacturing and even for the heating of homes. The infirmities of age and the helplessness of infancy are not protected from the rigors of the winter season because of the shortage of freight cars. When this country is prosperous; when its factories are running full time and a bountiful crop has been harvested by the farmer, the railroads are unable to carry the freight of the country and there is no prospect of railroad facilities being increased so as to overtake the transportation demands. The cost of transportation has increased enormously, so that it bears an undue proportion to the cost of production. For instance, the transportation of coal from the mouth of the mine is frequently more than the cost of the coal at the mine. While transportation costs are likely to remain relatively high and are sure to be higher than they were before the war, the cost of shipment by water is always lower than that by rail, and nonperishable products, such as grain, lumber, oil, coal, and ore, should be transported by water and the lighter and more perishable products be left for rail shipment.

The congestion in transportation exists in the interior of the country. There is no difficulty about shipment on the ocean. In fact, ocean tonnage is at the present moment tied up for lack of business, much of which would have cargoes if only they could be transported to the seaboard. So the most pressing question presented is one of the improvement of our interior waterways, of our lakes, and our rivers. There never has been a time when such congestion of transportation existed or when the price of transportation was so high as to-day. The farmer was never in such straits from inability to ship the products which have cost him a year's work and outlay as right now, and the industrial life and the physical well-being of the community were never as acutely menaced by the shortage of fuel as at this moment.

So we approach a consideration of the question whether the greater appropriation sought by the amendment is needed, having in mind the congestion and the high freight rates; the needs of the farmer and the consumer; and the critical condition of the manufacturer and of the householder. The situation differs so entirely from any conditions which have existed in the past that it is impossible to reach a fair solution of the question as to what amount is needed for the improvement and maintenance of our rivers and harbors by a comparison with the past.

It is easy to say that the $37,000,000 carried in the bill and the $12,000,000 in the Treasury make a total of $49,000,000, which is more than has been expended in any fiscal year for some considerable period. Those who urge this forget, however, that during the war we appropriated only for such projects as were necessary for war purposes, and that since the war and until a year ago we have been limited in our expenditures on account of the very great burden of taxation being borne by our people. For these reasons the appropriations and the expenditures have been kept down to a minimum. Indeed, not alone was the prosecution of waterway improvements abandoned, but even maintenance was neglected and harbors were allowed to silt and lose the depth which they had before the war. So at the present time we are met with such a necessity for the improvement of our waterways as never before existed, and at the same time our rivers and harbors are in worse condition than they have been for a long period of years.

The doubling of the transportation demands of our country each decade, the inability of the railroads to meet this enormous, rapid, and steady growth in property needing shipment, and the fact that the waterways alone can furnish the relief which this country needs now and will need to a greater extent and more seriously each year, if we are to avoid waste of our farm and manufactured products, is shown by the following statements of great transportation authorities.

RAILROAD COMMENT ON RAIL CONGESTION.

Mr. C. H. Markham, president of the Illinois Central Railroad, makes the following statement:

What is commonly called the "car shortage" is in reality a shortage of all kinds of railway facilities, including locomotives, freight cars, passing trucks, terminal facilities, etc. For a number of years the rate at which the railroads have been able to increase their facilities has gradually fallen off, while the ton-mileage hauled, which represents public demand for transportation, has been gaining steadily.

In the seven years ending with 1907 the number of locomotives increased 2,500 a year and the number of freight cars 90,000 a year. In the next seven years the number of locomotives increased only 1,500 a year and the number of freight cars only 50,000 a year. In the seven years ending with 1921 the number of locomotives increased only 275 a year and the number of freight cars only 6,000 a year. The increase in the number of locomotives in the seven years ending with 1921 was only one-ninth as great as in the seven years ending with 1907, while the increase in the number of freight cars was only one-fifteenth as great. The decline in the amount and capacity of the equipment provided has been accompanied by a corresponding decline in other facilities. This condition can not continue without causing frequently recurring losses of a serious nature to the country.

Vice President McCrea of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., before the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce, on February 24, 1922, made the following statement:

In the United States during the 12 months ending December, 1921, but 400 miles of new line were built, while 700 miles were abandoned. Practically no railroads have built double track, increased their yard facilities, or taken steps to relieve congested points where they have had much of their trouble in the past few years and know they will have more trouble in the future. We have had no money for this; every dollar available and all of our energies have of necessity been expended in restoring our existing facilities to a safe and efficient operating condition.

Vice President Elisha Lee of the Pennsylvania Railroad, before the Manufacturers' Association of Philadelphia, recently stated:

Traffic on our American railroads, measured in ton-miles, doubles about once in a decade, or possibly a little longer. The next time our country has a real revival in business we shall in all probability be confronted with the most severe congestion of railroad traffic and the greatest inadequacy of railroad facilities ever experienced in our history.

When that happens rates will be lost sight of. Everyone will be clamoring for service, and our public highways will again be torn to pieces by huge truck loads of freight, carried over roadways never designed for such purposes, and at rates and costs of operation so high as to constitute economic waste.

Nothing could more quickly check a wave of prosperity than the inability of our railroad facilities to handle the traffic which good times would create.

The late James J. Hill, the greatest railroad builder and manufacturer the country has ever known, in an address which he made at Chicago 12 years ago, in which he took issue with objectors to waterways, said:

Nature indicates that the commerce of the Middle West, with the rest of the world, should be carried in part by the Mississippi River and its navigable tributaries. The burden, which the railroads can not carry, will be shared by the waterways. The congestion arising from a steadily increasing volume of commerce will be relieved by turning over a share of the business to the towboats and the barges. Here lies the most practical exit from our national transportation dilemma.

Seeing, as we do, the need of water transportation in order that the food and manufactured products of our country may reach the point of consumption and not be wasted and lost, we next come to the question whether the appropriation suggested by the amendment is necessary. The amount is based on a most careful itemized estimate prepared by the Chief of Engineers on consultation with the district and division engineers stationed throughout the country. As everyone knows, the country is divided for waterway purposes into divisions and they in turn into districts. Each district has an engineer, and they in turn are under a division engineer, who is subject to the Chief of Engineers. The district engineers are stationed in their several districts. They are on the ground, and they know the needs of the district. On the other hand, they are disinterested and are not affected by local ambitions, prejudices, or desires for the expenditure of Government money. They have only one object in view—the legitimate improvement of our waterways—and only one master to serve—the United States Government. They are men who have had the best educational opportunities and who have spent their lives studying our waterway problems. So from the standpoint of disinterestedness, ability, and familiarity with the subject, their estimates and reports are the best information which could possibly be obtained, and they are subject to check, too, by the review of the division engineer and again by the Chief of Engineers. In such ways and after all possible reductions have been made by the division engineers and the Chief of Engineers the estimates of what are needed for the coming fiscal year were prepared. They are as follows:

	Improvement.	Maintenance.
Principal seacoast harbors	$19,683,410	$7,375,400
Secondary harbors and coastwise channels	7,860,900	1,509,600
Lake harbors and channels	1,726,000	1,450,800
Principal rivers	13,726,000	2,249,000
Secondary rivers	181,820	826,980
Tota l improvement	43,178,130	13,411,780
Total, maintenance	13,411,780
Grand total	56,589,910

In all the time I have had the honor to serve in Congress no opponent of appropriations for waterways in our country has ever gone to the extent of attacking the spending of the money necessary to put and keep our coast harbors and coastwise channels in condition to accommodate vessels and barges of the size and draft now in use. A few illustrations will serve to show that we are not to-day in our usual condition as to these harbors and channels, but that owing to the interruption of work during the war and to small appropriations made immediately following the war, because of the pressure of taxation, many of our great harbors are in a deplorable condition, with channels which have silted and filled so that they have not to-day the depth they had when the present projects for their improvement were adopted.

Congress adopted a project for the obtaining of a 35-foot depth in the Delaware River in June, 1910. In the succeeding six years this project was 45 per cent completed. In the five years since then only 28 per cent has been added, and to-day the project is only 73 per cent completed. It was estimated at the time that funds to the credit of the improvements from previous appropriations would complete a 30-foot project. Since that time there has been spent toward obtaining the 35-foot project the enormous sum of $15,428,586.26. Yet with all this expenditure the controlling depth to-day remains 30 feet, and this great waterway, with over 15,000,000 tons of traffic, will not have the benefit of the 35-foot depth until the remaining 27 per cent of the work is done, and every year of delay is causing the Government the loss of the interest on the amount already expended, a loss of $925,714 annually. At the same rate of progress at which the work has been prosecuted in the past it will take five years to complete it, and this would make a loss in interest of approximately $6,000,000. Could any private business stand such an enormous loss? Ought the Government to deliberately plan to make this loss by failing to complete the work at the earliest date possible?

Go south to the Gulf coast and take Mobile as another illustration. Congress adopted a project for a depth of 30 feet in the inner channel in 1917. In the five years which have elapsed since the adoption of the project only 24 per cent of the work has been done, and yet here is a city which has less commerce to-day by reason of the insufficiency of the depth of its channel than it had when the project was adopted. It has now 1,400,000 tons of freight, and it had then 1,800,000.

We come next to the Lake harbors and channels. Transportation of the Great Lakes has been the marvel of all times. It is the cheapest transportation the world has ever known, the average cost being 1 mill per ton per mile and the volume carried, varying from 70,000,000 to 100,000,000 tons, is staggering in its size. The amount estimated for the maintenance and improvement of all the harbors in the Great Lakes is only $3,000,000, a mere trifle, simply nothing in comparison with the value to the country of the enormous traffic carried each year.

The next group of estimates is for the principal rivers of the country, and the amount asked is approximately $15,000,000. This is divided among 12 rivers, and their needs and improvements are such that we will be benefited by a somewhat detailed examination of them.

The Hudson River is one of the greatest streams in the country, connected with the Great Lakes by the Erie and Oswego Canals. The two canals have been recently improved from a depth of 9 to 12 feet, and since the completion of this work there has not been time in which to construct canal barges, but none the less the river has been carrying from two to three million tons of freight annually, worth from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000. The traffic on the canals has grown by leaps and bounds the last two years. It will grow still more rapidly in the future, until the canals are carrying and the Hudson receives the full tonnage capacity of the canals—10,000,000 tons. Yet for this great river, with the present project incomplete, the engineers in the estimates on which the amendment was based ask nothing for the completion of the improvement and only a sum necessary to maintain it.

An 8-foot project for the Mississippi River from Cairo to St. Louis was adopted in 1910, with a provision that it should be completed in 12 years. The 12 years have passed but the project is only 34 per cent completed. At the same rate of progress it would take a quarter of a century to complete the work, and in all, 36 years instead of 12.

In 1907 Congress adopted a 6-foot project for the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Missouri—practically at St. Louis—to Minneapolis. In 1910 Congress declared that this work should be completed in 12 years. Twelve years have passed and the project is but 49 per cent completed. At the same rate of progress it will take 12 years to complete it, and 28 years altogether.

With practically no boats on the Mississippi, except 50 barges and 9 power boats owned by the Government, and with all the disadvantages and large expenditures incident to Government operation, this fleet has carried 1,279,270 tons of traffic during the past season, at an average saving to the shipper of $1.35 per ton over the cost of rail transportation. This was done, too, despite the added disadvantage incident to the lowest water in the river which has prevailed for many years and infinite and continued trouble owing to the fact that the Government has not completed the improvement, and in consequence the barges had to meet frequent shoals and sand banks in the channel.

The capacity of the river for the carrying of traffic is practically unlimited. Under all of these circumstances the engineers estimate only $1,625,000 for improvement and $525,000 for maintenance of the river. Surely no one will claim that a less appropriation should be made for the "Father of Waters" or that the great Middle West, with its farmers embarrassed from inability to ship and market their grain, should not have this additional means of reaching the sea and the centers of commerce.

The project for a 9-foot channel throughout the entire length of the Ohio River from Pittsburgh to Cairo was adopted in 1910, with a provision that the project should be completed in 12 years. The project embraces 53 locks and dams, of which 37 have been completed. The total cost of the improvement to this date is over $65,000,000. It will only cost $10,000,000 to complete the work. The distance from Pittsburgh to Cairo is 968 miles, yet with six-sevenths of the total cost already expended, only 278 miles of continuous channel are available from Pittsburgh west, and that is of value only for local transportation, because while it starts at Pittsburgh it ends nowhere. So that the interest on this $65,000,000 investment of $4,000,000 a year is largely lost until the project is completed. The Ohio and its tributaries tap and furnish transportation for the very heart and center of the country, for many of its great natural resources, for many and great coal mines, for vast forests, and for a great and rich agricultural area. Indeed, the natural resources and the developed industries of the upper stretches of the Ohio and of the region through which the Monongahela runs are so vast that it has been termed the greatest workshop of the world, and it has been said that it is the greatest freight-producing center of the country. If the Ohio, with less than a third of its channel completed, starting somewhere but ending nowhere, can carry over 8,000,000 tons of freight, as it does, what will it carry when its splendid length of nearly a thousand miles is all completed? When it has feeding it—furnishing it commerce—all of its great tributaries—the Cumberland, the Tennessee, the Kentucky, the Green and Barren, the two Kanawhas, the Allegheny, and last and greatest of all the wonderful Monongahela—when it will reach from the heart of the continent, from the greatest workshop of the world to the Father of Waters and on to the sea, what, then, will be the tonnage it will carry? The prospect staggers even the imagination.

The Monongahela in its very brief course of 125 miles carries in ordinary years nearly 25,000,000 tons of freight. New and great industries are springing up over night on its banks. The traffic is so congested and the facilities are so inadequate that transportation is dangerous in the extreme. Only $2,000,000 is asked to remedy conditions which are well-nigh intolerable and where one of the greatest volumes of commerce in the world exists. The improvement now so essential to the safety of the commerce on this great stream is the placing of double instead of single locks and the construction of guard and guide walls.

The Cumberland River divides into two projects—the first project, 192 miles in length, below Nashville, and the second, 133 miles long, above that city. Four million dollars has been spent on the lower project. Less than $700,000 is required to complete it. Only about 100 miles of this project has the project depth. That the project is a good one is evident from the fact that it carried over 263,000 tons of freight in 1921, in spite of the fact, as was said in the case of the Ohio, that the improved channel leads from Nashville toward but not even to the incomplete Ohio. And again, it may be asked if leading from somewhere to nowhere it carries its present tonnage, what will the tonnage be when it and the Ohio are both completed? Moreover, if the Congress was unwise which adopted the project, is there anyone who will contend that with $4,000,000 already expended and less than $700,000 necessary to complete the project, and with 263,000 tons of shipments under the present disadvantageous conditions, the project should not be completed as soon as possible? Four hundred and sixty thousand dollars only is asked for the project. The work on this project was started at Nashville and the completed channel is still 88 miles from the junction with the Ohio.

The Cumberland above Nashville has had two projects adopted—one for 8 locks and dams in 1886 and the other for 10 additional locks and dams in 1919. The two projects are now treated as one and 30 per cent of the united project has been completed at an expense of $3,600,000. It will require something over $7,000,000 to complete the work. The stream, when completed, will lead into a country with no rail transportation facilities and having untold wealth in forests and mines and a rich and productive agricultural region. While the traffic last year in its incompleted state carried only about 142,000 tons, in the prosperous year 1918 it carried 276,000 tons.

The Tennessee River is divided into three sections. The first section, between Riverton and the Ohio, was adopted in 1912. One million five hundred and fourteen thousand dollars has been spent on it and it is 79 per cent completed. The project is one for a draft of 6 feet, and only 4 feet is available for a considerable part of the year. It will only require $144,000 to complete the project and give the project depth all the year round. Under the present disadvantages the stream carried approximately 350,000 tons of freight in 1921.

The next section is from Chattanooga to Riverton, except Browns Island to Florence (Muscle Shoals), a distance of 211 miles. The project is for 6-foot navigation. Over $5,000,000 has already been spent. Four million six hundred and eighty thousand dollars is required to complete the work. Owing to the fact that the project itself is one partially completed, and that navigation through Muscle Shoals is not open as yet, the navigation is local, but in spite of that as high as 185,000 tons has been carried on this section of the river of diversified and valuable freight. Nothing is asked for maintenance and only $155,000 toward completing the project.

The next project is one above Chattanooga, 188 miles in length, for a 6-foot draft for 24 miles of the distance and for a less draft for the balance of the distance. The project is 58 per cent completed. Two million four hundred and thirty-eight thousand dollars has been spent and it will require $3,250,000 to complete the project. The river is navigable for a very limited draft, yet it carried in 1921 486,760 tons of freight. Nothing is asked toward completing the improvement and only $20,000 for maintenance. This is less than 5 cents a ton. Surely we can afford to spend that much for this great volume of freight. The traffic consists of a great variety of products, showing the country to be one worthy of improvement.

The Black Warrior, Warrior, and Tombigbee Rivers project was originally adopted in 1899, and is for an all year round 6-foot depth of water. Over $10,000,000 has been spent on the project, and all that is asked now is an additional expenditure of $77,800. In 1921 these rivers carried 784,967 tons of freight, largely coal, lumber, steel, and iron. All that is asked is $64,000 for the improvement, with nothing for maintenance.

The Ouachita and Black Rivers, Ark. and La., project for 6½-foot draft of water, for a distance of 360 miles, was adopted by eight different acts, the first in 1902. Four million nine hundred and five thousand dollars has been spent to date. Only $400,000 is necessary to complete the project. It has carried as high as 178,000 tons of commerce in a year. While we might differ with the eight Congresses which have passed favorably upon this project we are losing nearly as much in interest on this project as it will cost to complete it. Can there be any doubt whatever that it should be finished at once?

FOX RIVER, WIS.

The existing project was adopted in and prior to 1907. It provides for a 6-foot channel from Depere to Montello, 125 miles; and for 4-foot thence to Portage, 31 miles; also for 4-foot in the Wolf River from its mouth to New London, 47 miles. The project is about 93 per cent completed. Total expenditures to date are $4,014,000. It will take but $15,000 to complete the project. The commerce for 1921 was 285,590 tons of coal and building materials. Nothing is asked for completing the improvement; $160,000 is needed for maintenance.

ILLINOIS RIVER, ILL.

The project is for a channel 7 feet deep from its mouth to La Salle, 226 miles. It was adopted in 1880 and 1907. It is about 93 per cent completed. The total amount expended is $2,562,562. The amount necessary to complete the project is $312,300. The commerce for 1921 was 157,546 tons of grain, live stock, coal, logs, apples, and merchandise. The State of Illinois is now constructing an 8-foot waterway from Chicago to the head of this improvement at a cost of $20,000,000, and the two will furnish a through improved channel from the Great Lakes, at Chicago, to the Mississippi River. Only $65,000 is asked for continuing the improvement and $130,000 is needed for maintenance.

SACRAMENTO RIVER, CALIF.

The existing project, adopted in and before 1912, provides for improving this river for over 250 miles to a depth of 7 feet from the mouth to Sacramento, 61 miles, and for lesser depths above that point. The project has been completed. The commerce for 1921 amounted to 976,596 tons of farm products, canned goods, oil, and general merchandise. The total amount expended is $1,739,871. All that is asked now is $95,000 for maintenance.

My colleague, Mr. NEWTON of Missouri, is a profound student of waterway transportation problems, but he is especially familiar with the history of the improvement of the Missouri River and with the outlook as to future commerce being carried upon the stream. He is in position to inform the House as to this stream much better than anyone else and he has consented to place his information at the service of the House. I, therefore, leave this subject to be dealt with by him, feeling certain that we will all be instructed by what he has to say on the question.

The following table showing the project depth of the various rivers in the central part—in the heart—of the country, of the number of miles to be improved in each river, and of the progress toward completion of the various projects will be of interest:

Projects.	Project depth (feet).	Length (miles).	Per cent completed.

When this great wide-spreading chain of natural waterways has been completed it will have as its combined length 6,627 miles—more than twice the distance across the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Gentlemen who have had doubt about the wisdom and the value of improving the rivers of our country will, I believe, be astonished to learn that the 12 rivers which are listed by the Chief of Engineers as being the principal rivers and the improvements which I have described in detail carried, in 1921, one of the poorest years for a long time for traffic, the enormous total of 31,253,307 tons of commerce. Taking for each of these 12 rivers the year when it carried its largest amount of traffic, I have no doubt that the total of the commerce borne by these streams on such a computation would be found to be 40,000,000 tons. If the commerce on these rivers can reach such a magnificent figure with the channels incomplete, with capital waiting to construct barges and ships until the improvements have been completed and until the channels lead from one industrial and commercial center to another and through great centers of population and wonderful undeveloped resources, awaiting only a reasonable and certain means of conveyance to points of development and consumption; with the localities along the routes waiting to build terminals and warehouses; with railroads putting off the making of connections with the boat lines, what and how great will be the commerce when capital is encouraged to invest in ships, when people see that docks and warehouses will be used, and when railroads know that, if they connect with the docks, they will receive shipments. If the commerce is 40,000,000 tons to-day, what will it be when these projects have all been completed and these great changes take place? While we can not foresee the future we can look to a completed project like the harbors and channels of the Great Lakes and see the marvelous tonnage which has developed there and the low rate at which it is carried since the improvements on the Lakes were finished.

The engineer's estimate for what was denominated as "secondary rivers," in spite of the fact that many of them furnish the only means of transportation to the people who reside in their vicinity, is only $1,000,000. The total tonnage of these rivers in 1921, the poorest of recent years for transportation, as has been already pointed out, amounted to over 5,000,000 tons.

One of these secondary rivers alone carries over 1,000,000 tons of freight, and two others over a half million. There are altogether 58 of these secondary rivers. No one can believe that less than $1,000,000 should be appropriated for all of these rivers, carrying 5,040,921 tons of commerce. Only $181,820 is appropriated for improvements, and the balance of $826,980 is for maintenance.

It is obvious from the fact that we need for our seacoast harbors and coastwise channels $36,000,000; for our Lake harbors and channels $3,000,000, making $39,000,000, $2,000,000 more than the $37,000,000 proposed by the committee in charge of the bill for all of our rivers and harbors; that our rivers will have to go without any part of the $17,000,000 which they so badly need. Realizing, as we all must, that the appropriation problem is one from the interior to the seacoast, and from the West to the thickly settled East, by the Great Lakes, and over the nearly 7,000 miles of the Mississippi and its tributaries, who would be satisfied to appropriate nothing for the rivers of the country?

So one of the questions and a great question to be decided by each member is whether he is prepared to support the continuance of the improvement of our waterways which carry 45,000,000 tons of freight or wants to reduce the estimates of the engineers so that nothing there will be left for either maintenance or improvement of our great inland waterways.

And when each member has considered and decided this question, he will find himself confronted by another. In September last the House, by an overwhelming majority, passed a rivers and harbors project bill adopting 40 new projects, at an estimated cost of $43,792,100, and the Chief of Engineers has estimated that $13,547,920 can be spent profitably on these new projects in the coming year.

The adoption of these new projects grew largely out of the traffic necessities which have developed on account of the vastly increased and rapidly growing commerce of the country. For instance, during the World War freight cars were piled up, loaded for shipment, for 50 miles outside the city of New York owing to the traffic situation in New York City. Now, all of the commerce from the interior of the country and all that comes from abroad, whether destined for New York or beyond it, must pass through the most congested business district of the city of New York. This results in endless and long delays and in very great transfer and terminal charges, the combined effect being most burdensome to the shipper and the consumer.

The port of New York realized the seriousness and the necessity of promptly remedying these conditions. The municipalities around New York Harbor, in New York and New Jersey, have combined through legislation in the two States and of Congress to modernize the port by the construction of channels and the building of railroads, warehouses, and docks so that the traffic destined beyond New York either from abroad or from the interior and the traffic which is to be warehoused and distributed from New York shall pass through the outskirts of the city or through tunnels, and congestion, unreasonable expense, and delay be avoided.

To accomplish this end the port authorities will spend $500,000,000 or more. All of this work and this vast expenditure will, however, be unavailing unless the United States does its part, and so in the project bill of last September Congress provided for the deepening of the New York and New Jersey channels and of Newark Bay so that shipments by the numerous transcontinental railroads, which terminate in New Jersey, may be transferred direct from the railroad tracks to the ocean liners and shipments from abroad from the ocean liners to the railroad dock.

In the same way we provided for the improvement of Jamaica Bay, which will receive shipments from abroad and from the interior destined abroad, which will shorten the ocean voyage both ways by about 30 miles, as well as shipments to and from New England, and will provide as well new and great additional dock and warehouse facilities and rail accommodation, exchanges, and transfers.

All of the vast expenditure by the New York port authorities will go for naught unless the Federal Government does what the September bill provided for it to do—unless it digs the channels through Kill Van Kull and Newark Bay and in Jamaica Bay. All of Staten Island, too, is given a modern depth by the recent bill, and it will all become available for warehouse and dockage if the Staten Island project is completed within a reasonable time. The whole country is interested in relieving the congestion and in expediting the transfer and reducing the cost of it in and about New York City. The shipper and the consumer both suffer from present conditions, and that includes pretty much everyone in the United States. The amount to be expended by the Federal Government is a mere trifle compared with what the locality itself is ready and willing to expend. Is there anyone who doubt the advisability, nay, the absolute necessity, of the prompt completion of these three new projects?

Now, let us go down to the Gulf coast and we find that there the Sabine-Neches waterway is one of the marvels of modern commerce in the rapidity of its development and in the volume of its commerce. In 1901 this waterway carried only 150,000 tons of freight. In 1921 it had grown to over 11,000,000, including both that originating and that carried in transit, almost wholly oil, valued at $400,000,000. This waterway has a depth of only 25 feet, while the tankers which navigate it draw from 30 to 35 feet. So they can only be partially loaded and the cost of transportation is unnecessarily and unduly high. Nothing is of broader general use than oil and its products, and so the bill of last September provided for a depth in this waterway of 30 feet. Surely everyone will agree that, in the interest of as low a cost as possible for oil and gasoline, this project should be completed at the very earliest date possible.

Next, we go over to the Pacific coast and its two great ports—Coos Bay and Umpqua Bay—with countless billions of feet of Government timber, the best timber and greatest trees in the world. The forests of New England have long since been exhausted. Of late the East has been depending upon the South for its lumber. The peak of production was reached there several years ago. Since then the production has been declining. The local demand is constantly growing and the time is near at hand when the South will need all of its lumber for home consumption. There will remain then no place from which the East and the Middle West can secure a supply of timber except from the Government forests of Washington and Oregon, but the price will be prohibitive unless this lumber can be brought to us by water in deep-draft ships, and such transportation will be impossible unless great harbors like Coos Bay and Umpqua Bay are improved. The Government alone will receive a large amount in the increased value of its timber for whatever is expended in making these improvements. In the interest of the Government alone, as well as in the interest of the people of the country, these two bays should be improved without delay.

Yet, if the appropriation for rivers and harbors is only $37,000,000, as proposed in the bill, very little will be done on the great projects approved in the September bill, of which New York Harbor, the Sabine-Neches waterway, Coos Bay, and Umpqua Bay are only fair samples. It would be bad business judgment, when both the new projects and the old projects can not be prosecuted owing to the inadequacy of the funds available, to tear up the Government plants which are prosecuting the work of the old projects and transfer them to the new projects. Such a course would be expensive in the extreme and would not be warranted. And so, unless the amount recommended by the engineers is appropriated, all of the efforts to modernize the waterways and the waterway transportation system of the country to fit them to meet the present needs of the country—in oil, in lumber, in coal, in all of the great necessities—will fail and be deferred to some later and unknown day. Can the country afford this? Should not the judgment of the House deliberately expressed in the passage of the September project bill be respected and the $13,000,000 needed for the coming fiscal year for starting new projects be appropriated? Nothing will have been appropriated for these new projects unless the amount embodied in the amendment is approved by the committee and that amount is appropriated.

It is suggested that there is $12,000,000 in the Treasury which should be added to the $37,000,000 carried in the bill. This amount is very much less than the amount of the available balance in the Treasury at the end of most fiscal years, as will be seen from the following statement:

Fiscal year ending June 30—	Unexpended balance at end of fiscal year.	Contract obligations and outstanding liabilities.	Balance available at end of fiscal year
1917	$45,136,143.44	$17,317,432.45	$27,818,710.99
1918	49,790,388.19	15,866,560.64	33,923,827.55
1919	82,847,287.50	16,328,740.58	66,518,545.92
1920	65,196,675.83	26,071,973.55	39,124,702.28
1921	44,347,323.23	12,634,775.39	31,712,547.84
1922	17,076,321.67	7,339,934.57	9,736,387.10

This matter is placed in a still clearer light by the following table, showing the amounts available in the Treasury at the times when the appropriations were made, in the years 1919, 1920, and 1921, as follows, viz:

Date of appropriation.	Unexpended balance at end of month prior to date of appropriation	Contract obligations and outstanding liabilities.	Balance available at end of month prior to date of appropriation.
Mar. 1, 1919	$58,414,366.87	$11,519,836.77	$46,894,530.10
June 5, 1920	55,583,809.15	25,881,894.93	29,711,914.22
Mar. 1, 1921	39,507,132.45	16,286,743.97	23,220,388.48

The opinion of the Chief of Engineers of the result of keeping less than $12,000,000 in the Treasury as an emergency fund is expressed as follows:

It would, of course, be practicable to have less than $12,000,000 available in the Treasury, but a lesser amount than this would mean practical cessation of all active river and harbor operations, as was the case on June 30 1922, when the available balance ran down to a little less than $10,000,000. Among the reasons why the operations will largely cease when the available balance runs below $12,000,000 may be mentioned the following:

(a) The number of improvements now carried on the books is approximately 500. The balance is not distributed equally among these improvements, but is concentrated among a few of the larger improvements, such as the East River, Delaware River, Ohio River, and a few others where conditions are such that it is impracticable to reduce the balances to low figures. This means that the greater number of the improvements will be without any applicable funds.

(b) The Engineer Department has a floating plant of which the first cost is between $25,000,000 and $30,000,000, and whose present value is considerably in excess of its first cost. Included in this plant are about 160 dredges, 175 snag and derrick boats, 200 towboats, and other valuable pieces of plant. The maintenance and operation of this plant amounts to a very considerable sum per month, and the funds can not be reduced to such a low point as to prevent proper care of the plant in case of its being necessarily laid up for lack of funds to operate it.

(c) During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, the number of employees of the Engineer Department varied from 10,618 to 24,888. The reduction of the available funds to a low point would necessitate the discharge of a very large number of these employees, many of whom, even in the unskilled positions, are men who have been employed for years and who are thoroughly conversant with their duties. The disorganization which would result from the discharge of these men and a complete cessation of work would cost the Government a very large sum of money. It can not be calculated in dollars and cents, but it would be a very material loss.

(d) It is always possible that emergencies may arise which may make it necessary to do some immediate work for the relief of navigation or the protection of Government works. For this reason a reasonable working balance is necessary.

5. As shown by the data above, the only time the available balance has been reduced to less than $12,000,000 in the past six years was in June, 1922, and, as stated above, at that time the river and harbor work was by this fact brought practically to a standstill, and the same will be true at any other time that the balance is reduced to that point. It can be confidently predicted that we can not safely permit the balance on June 30, 1924, to be less than this amount, and whatever sum may be appropriated at this session of Congress will be the amount that can be used during the next year.

In conclusion, if we are to increase the value of our rivers by multiplying the freight carried by them; if we are to realize the benefit of the wise expenditures we have already made and not continue indefinitely to lose the interest on the vast sum already spent; if we are to relieve congestion and enable the farmer and the manufacturer to send his product to market; if we are to avail ourselves of the only cheap transportation possible, we should help the engineers in their estimates and appropriate $56,000,000. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, ever since Henry Ford made his proposal to operate the nitrate plants and lease the water power at Muscle Shoals, there has been a great campaign of opposition on the part of certain interests and their friends, who are evidently determined to defeat the acceptance of the Ford proposal. Running through this opposition is the constant claim that the farmers will be disappointed who expect to secure any fertilizer benefits by the operation of Muscle Shoals under the Ford offer. It has been claimed that—

Those who favor the Ford offer are fooling the farmer when they claim that Henry Ford will use the plant at Muscle Shoals and the water power at Dams Nos. 2 and 3 for the manufacture of fertilizer.

The National Fertilizer Association, in a pamphlet of propaganda against the Ford offer, said on page 6:

Another misconception is that through the operation of the Muscle Shoals nitrate plant the farmer would receive a plentiful supply of fertilizer at reduced prices.

And the Kearns report, from a minority of the Committee on Military Affairs, states on page 3, with regard to fertilizer production under the Ford offer:

Our position is that this is a hollow promise made to enlist the support of the farmers and not absolutely binding on any fact contained in the contract or existing outside of the contract.

Mr. Chairman, if these statements are true there is a "joker" in the Ford proposal, and it must be a remarkable "joker"—a "joker" capable of misleading not only the majority of the members of the Military Committee of this House but the majority of the farmers of the United States.

NO "JOKER" IN SECTION 15.

There is one sure way to find the answer to these statements, and that is in the Ford offer itself. Paragraph 15 of Mr. Ford's signed offer says in plain English:

15. Since the manufacture, sale, and distribution of commercial fertilizers to farmers and other users thereof constitutes one of the principal considerations of this offer the company expressly agrees that continuously throughout the lease period, except as it may be prevented by reconstruction of the plant itself or by war, strikes, accidents, fires, or other causes beyond its control, it will manufacture nitrogen and other commercial fertilizers, mixed or unmixed, and with or without filler, according to demand, at Nitrate Plant No. 2 or its equivalent, or at such other plant or plants adjacent or near thereto as it may construct, using the most economical source of power available. The annual production of these fertilizers shall have a nitrogen content of at least 40,000 tons of fixed nitrogen, which is the present annual capacity of Nitrate Plant No. 2. If during the lease period said Nitrate Plant No. 2 is destroyed or damaged from any cause, the company agrees to restore such plant within a reasonable time to its former capacity * * *.

ENOUGH NITROGEN TO MAKE 2,000,000 TONS OF 2-8-2 MIXED FERTILIZER ANNUALLY.

I contend, Mr. Chairman, that this constitutes a definite binding agreement to produce at least 40,000 tons of fixed nitrogen annually, which is enough nitrogen to make 2,000,000 tons of 2-8-2 mixed fertilizer. I might say in passing that in 1921 there were only 5,000,000 tons of fertilizer consumed in the United States, so that Mr. Ford's obligation represented 40 per cent of the country's entire tonnage for that year.

WHAT THE ACTING JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL OF THE ARMY SAYS ABOUT IT.

It has been maintained, it is true, that the expression "except as it may be prevented by the reconstruction of the plant itself or by war, strikes, accidents, fires, or other causes beyond its control" offers a loophole, because the market price itself may be a cause beyond the control of Mr. Ford or his company, and that the inability to compete in the fertilizer market might be sufficient cause to warrant him in stopping the manufacture of fertilizer. Fortunately the highest legal authority in the Army has already passed on this point. On February 10, 1922, Col. John A. Hull, Acting Judge Advocate General, testified before our committee as follows:

Mr. PARKER. Then it is a serious matter of doubt whether he would have to go on and have to dispose of the goods at a loss if the market price was below what he could make it for?

Colonel HULL. He would have to do it, unless relieved either by Congress or a court of equity.

Mr. PARKER. But it says, "other causes beyond his control," and the price of the goods on the market would be beyond his control.

Colonel HULL. As I said, in my judgment the courts would not hold that price would be "other causes beyond his control."

Mr. PARKER. You think not?

Colonel HULL. No, sir.

The Acting Judge Advocate General also gave us the following testimony that day:

Mr. HULL. If we accept this contract with Mr. Ford, does that leave us free of any contract or liability with any other company?

Colonel HULL. I should say so.

Mr. HULL. You had something to do, as I understand it, with the drafting of this contract?

Colonel HULL. It was drafted in the office.

Mr. HULL. Then I presume you know something about the liability of Mr. Ford under that contract?

Colonel HULL. Yes, sir; it has been studied.

Mr. HULL. Would he be bound to produce fertilizer under that contract if it was found possible?

Colonel HULL. As now drafted?

Mr. HULL. As now drafted he would have to produce at least——

Colonel HULL (interposing). To the maximum capacity of plant No. 2.

Mr. HULL. There would not be any question about that?

Colonel HULL. There is not any, in my mind.

The CHAIRMAN. Under what section?

Colonel HULL. Section 14.

Mr. HULL. Suppose he could not produce it; that it was found physically impossible to produce the fertilizer compound in paying quantities; what would be the result so far as the contract with the Government goes?

Colonel HULL. If the Government insists, a court of equity would grant relief, and not compel the performance of the impossible.

Mr. HULL. What section of the second contract with Mr. Ford covers that?

Colonel HULL. Section 14.

Mr. HULL. If it was found impossible to produce this fertilizer, I presume of course he would be enabled to take the hydroelectric power that was supposed to go into the production of the fertilizer and use it or sell it as he saw fit?

Colonel HULL. Yes; but, of course, he would be obligated to maintain his laboratory and experiments and try to produce.

Mr. HULL. He would have to keep experimenting and trying to produce fertilizer?

Colonel HULL. Yes, sir.

OPPOSITION SAYS HE CAN NOT DO IT EVEN IF HE AGREES TO DO IT.

But the opposition maintains that even if Mr. Ford has agreed to make fertilizer at Muscle Shoals he will not be able to do so. Mr. J. O. Hammitt, vice president of the Air Nitrates Corporation, the designers and builders of Nitrate Plant No. 2, on February 20, 1922, testifying before our committee, said, regarding Nitrate Plant No. 2:

The plant can not be operated commercially, Congressman, because it is not capable of making anything that has a market on which you could get back the cost of production * * *. It is simply not a practicable commercial proposition.

WHAT THE PRESIDENT OF THE NATIONAL FERTILIZER ASSOCIATION HAS TO SAY.

On the following day, before our committee, Mr. C. H. MacDowell, president of the Armour Fertilizer Co. and president of the National Fertilizer Association, referring to the cyanamid process at Nitrate Plant No. 2, testified:

Inside of five years this method will probably be called obsolete—

And Dr. Charles L. Parsons, consulting chemist, member of President Wilson's nitrate commission, testifying before our committee on March 10, 1922, said:

You can never hope to do anything with plant No. 2, and anybody that runs it will lose money very rapidly. * * * I do not believe Mr. Ford or anyone else can operate plant No. 2 to make fertilizer.

And the National Fertilizer Association in their booklet against the Ford offer say on page 5:

The fact is that neither Mr. Ford nor anybody else could make any fertilizer or fertilizer material through the use of the Muscle Shoals nitrate plant in time of peace even with cheap water power, except at a cost of production substantially greater than the present wholesale market price.

"HE CAN'T DO IT! HE CAN'T DO IT! HE CAN'T DO IT!"

So the chorus goes. He can't do it! He can't do it! But, in the name of common sense, Mr. Chairman, if he can't do it what is all the fuss about? My contentions are that if Mr. Ford gets Muscle Shoals it not only will be done, but the price of fertilizer will be reduced even before a wheel is turned at Muscle Shoals.

The opposing interests know very well that Mr. Ford's offer does not tie him down to any given process, for in paragraph 15, which I have just read, Mr. Ford says that his company will produce 40,000 tons of fixed nitrogen annually "at Nitrate Plant No. 2, or its equivalent, or at such other plant or plants as it may construct, using the most economical source of power available."

Does that mean that Mr. Ford is compelled to use the present cyanamid process—a process which has recently failed in Norway, where they have the cheapest water power in the world—in order to produce 40,000 tons of fixed nitrogen, sufficient to make 2,000,000 tons of 2–8–2 mixed fertilizer? Not at all. On the other hand, he definitely agrees in paragraph 14, section (a), to determine by research whether improved processes are available, and if so found and determined, to reasonably employ such improved methods.

PRESIDENT OF AMERICAN CYANAMID CO. BELIEVED FARMER WOULD GET CHEAPER FERTILIZER.

What is the testimony, Mr. Chairman, about these improved methods? Throughout the hearings during the past six years there runs the definite statement that air-fixation processes do exist whereby fertilizers may be furnished to the farmer for about one-half of what he would otherwise pay for them. That was the statement of Mr. F. S. Washburn, president of the American Cyanamid Co., before the House Committee on Agriculture, on February 9, 1916, when he said:

My anticipation is that the establishment of the nitrogen industry as it can be established, with what I believe and what I believe would appeal to those who study the subject is the proper and legitimate Government cooperation, will give the farmer his fertilizer for one-half of what he would otherwise pay for it.

And in the same year Dr. L. H. Baekeland, one of the foremost independent American chemists, member of the United States Naval Consulting Board, member of President Wilson's nitrate supply committee, testified before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, March 24, 1916:

The statement is made by the present Government monopoly in Germany that after the war is over and after what they know now about the synthetic manufacture of nitrogenous fertilizer from the air, after all the experience they have acquired during this war while making nitric acid, that they will be in such condition that they intend to furnish the farmers of Germany nitrogen fertilizer at about one-half the price it is costing the consumer here in the United States. If Germany can do that, gentlemen, there is not the slightest doubt in my mind that we can do the same here or that we can do better.

WHAT GERMANY HAS DONE.

How have these predictions been fulfilled? Germany is the great outstanding example of a country which, driven by the necessities of relentless warfare, was compelled to install and adopt these improved processes; and Doctor Parsons, testifying before our committee on March 10, 1922, said:

Ammonium sulphate is selling in Germany to-day, on our exchange, for approximately one-half the price it is selling in the market here.

And the Koppers Co., of Pittsburgh, in arguing for a duty on sulphate of ammonia to protect them, as they claim, against these war-built air-fixation nitrate plants of Germany, state on page 8:

The cost of operating these plants is relatively low, so that even to-day sulphate of ammonia is being sold in Germany at half the price in the United States, based on the present rate of exchange.

MR. MAYO THINKS FERTILIZER PRICES COULD BE CUT IN HALF.

This is all confirmed by Mr. Ford's representative, Mr. W. B. Mayo, in the following testimony before the Senate Committee on Agriculture (Hearings, p. 280):

Senator HEFLIN. The trust fixes the price of fertilizer to-day, Mr. Mayo, and it absolutely robs the farmers at the prices that it charges. I understand it is the purpose of Mr. Ford to manufacture fertilizers cheaper, so that the farmer will be able to buy fertilizers cheaper than he can buy them now under the trust control. Is not that the purpose?

Mr. MAYO. Well, offhand, we think we could make fertilizer at about half the price it is sold for to-day.

I want to say that I agree with Doctor Baekeland, that if Germany can do that, gentlemen, there is not the slightest doubt in my mind that with the resources and organization at his command Mr. Ford can do the same thing here, or that he can do better.

TWO MILLION TONS OF 2–8–2 MIXED FERTILIZER ANNUALLY FOR THE FARMERS.

Testifying regarding the advantages to agriculture of Mr. Ford's operations at Muscle Shoals, Mr. Mayo testified before our committee (Hearings, p. 977):

Nitrate Plant No. 2 will produce some 2,000,000 tons of completed 2–8–2 fertilizer, or somewhat more than 25 per cent of the annual fertilizer consumption of the United States. If Mr. Ford's economies result in saving only $15 per ton to the farmer, on only this amount of production, the annual saving would be $30,000,000, and the saving in 100 years, without interest, would be $3,000,000,000.

WHAT 40,000 TONS OF FIXED NITROGEN MEANS.

But, they say, Mr. Ford has not agreed to produce sulphate of ammonia. He has agreed to produce 40,000 tons of fixed nitrogen. What does that mean?

In brief it means enough nitrogen for the production of—

110,000 tons of ammonium nitrate, because ammonium nitrate contains 35 per cent nitrogen, or 160,000 tons of ammonium sulphate (which is the same thing as sulphate of ammonia), which contains 21 per cent nitrogen, or 220,000 tons of cyanamid, containing 21 per cent nitrogen, or 250,000 tons of Chilean nitrate, containing 15 per cent nitrogen, or
2,000,000 tons of 2–8–2 mixed fertilizer, containing 2 per cent nitrogen.

But the fertilizer which Mr. Ford would produce probably would not be any of these materials, but one of the more concentrated forms containing both nitrogen and phosphoric acid, which experts from the Department of Agriculture have testified could and should be produced at Muscle Shoals.

Since it has been shown before our committee, Mr. Chairman, that freight constitutes fully one-half of the cost of fertilizer delivered to the farmer, Mr. Ford would not need to produce improved products more cheaply than present products, but could greatly cheapen the cost of fertilizer if he merely produced fertilizer at present costs per unit of plant food, provided he produced the fertilizers in a more concentrated form and sold them, as provided in his offer, direct to the farmers and their agencies, thereby eliminating the greater part of the freight, handling charges, selling expenses, commissions, and so forth.

OBLIGATION TO MAKE FERTILIZER NOT CONTINGENT ON FORD'S MAKING A PROFIT.

But other opponents of the Ford offer state:

Mr. Ford, in his proposition to the Secretary of War, has not agreed to make one pound of fertilizer at Muscle Shoals unless he can make it at 8 per cent profit to himself.

Evidently these gentlemen have never read the definite written proposal which Henry Ford has signed. Whatever he may or may not have said in conversations with the Secretary of War or anyone else, Henry Ford finally signed and nailed down in his formal offer a definite obligation to produce the equivalent of 2,000,000 tons of 2–8–2 mixed fertilizer annually, and, as for the matter of profit, Mr. Ford states in his proposal:

In order that farmers and other users of fertilizer may be supplied with fertilizers at fair prices and without excessive profits, the company agrees that the maximum net profit which it shall make in the manufacture and sale of fertilizer products shall not exceed 8 per cent of the fair actual annual cost of production thereof.

Here we have a clear, straightforward statement—not that the manufacture of fertilizer is contingent upon Mr. Ford's ability to make 8 per cent or any other per cent, but a voluntary limitation upon his profits.

THE WAY SENATOR NORRIS UNDERSTANDS IT.

This was made clear in the testimony of Mr. Ford's chief engineer, Mr. Mayo, before the Senate Committee on Agriculture, of which Senator NORRIS is chairman (Senate hearings, p. 301):

The CHAIRMAN. My understanding of this proposition is that under this offer Mr. Ford would have to make fertilizer whether he made a profit or whether he did it at a loss, but that he could not make more than 8 per cent. Is that your understanding?

Mr. MAYO. That is correct; yes, sir.

Senator KENDRICK. Would he have to continue to make a fixed amount without regard to profit?

The CHAIRMAN. To the capacity of this plant.

Mr. MAYO. The amount stated here is the minimum amount, too.

FAIR ACTUAL ANNUAL COST OF PRODUCTION.

If Mr. Ford makes any profits at all, they are not to exceed 8 per cent on the fair actual annual cost of production, and a board of farmers representing the three great American farm organizations—the American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Grange, and the Farmers' Union—determine what is meant by the words "fair actual annual cost of production." Could any sane, reasonable man ask more?

The farmers, say Ford's opponents, are being fooled by his offer to limit his profits to 8 per cent. But, Mr. Chairman, the farmers are not fooled about the Ford offer. Neither are they fooled about the profits that the fertilizer companies have made out of them. The farmers know that these fertilizer interests, who would protect the poor farmer against the deceptions of the Ford offer, have been engaged in an industry that is more than 50 years old. The farmers know well that in all that time not one of these fertilizer makers has ever offered to open his books and let his customers pass on the fairness of his business transactions or to limit his profits to 8 per cent.

FERTILIZER CLAUSES WRITTEN BY THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE FARMERS.

It was the representatives of the farm organizations who themselves prepared the fertilizer clauses of the Ford proposal, and in order that there may be no doubt on this point I am inserting in the RECORD the following letters from the American Farm Bureau Federation:

JANUARY 15, 1923.

Hon. W. FRANK JAMES,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. JAMES: In compliance with your request for the history of the writing of the fertilizer guaranty clause of the Ford proposal I wish to advise you that at the time the wording of this proposal was being drawn up Mr. Ford's representative asked that the farmers check over this provision and make such changes as they thought would best protect their interests. This was agreed to. At a conference in the office of the American Farm Bureau Federation there were present Mr. Milo Campbell, of the National Milk Producers' Federation, Mr. R. F. Bower, who for many years has studied the Muscle Shoals development, and the writer. These represented the farmers; Mr. Mayo and Mr. Worthington representing Mr. Ford. The following changes were recommended by the farmers and agreed to by Mr. Ford's representatives, who agreed that they would get the approval of Mr. Ford to these changes, which they subsequently did.

The changes asked by the farmers were as follows: That the manufacture of commercial fertilizer be definitely provided for in the contract; that any improvement which may result from the research should be reasonably employed. In paragraph 15 where it might have been interpreted that the cost limitation would seem to be only at Nitrate Plant No. 2, the phrase "at Nitrate Plant No. 2" was stricken out entirely, leaving the maximum cost to apply to all fertilizer production. The word "fair" was inserted in advance of "actual annual cost of production thereof," which would give the board of farmers power to question the cost as to whether it is fair or not and eventually land a decision on this matter in the Federal Trade Commission. The distribution clause with reference to the authority of the board was written by the farmers and we believe safeguards their interests entirely.

Since these changes were made, at the request of the Military Committee, other slight changes in this section have been made, especially with regard to setting up the farmers' board, and these changes have been approved by the farmers' organizations.

With reference to your request to advise whether the fertilizer guaranty is adequate, I am inclosing a copy of a careful analysis of this clause prepared by the Farm Loan Federation and sent to their membership, and since this has been done we have had no criticism from any farmer as to the guaranty to manufacture fertilizer.

It is very significant to us that all three of the leading farm organizations whose interest in fertilizer is paramount, and consequently whose interest in this fertilizer guaranty clause is most vital, have approved the Ford proposal, including this clause; while the questioning of this fertilizer guaranty clause comes largely from the fertilizer manufacturers and the opposition to the Ford proposal.

I trust this information will be what you desire.

Yours very truly,

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION.
GRAY SILVER,
Washington Representative.

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
Washington, D. C., August 15, 1922.

Due to the fact that Members of Congress and others honestly criticizing the Ford proposal for Muscle Shoals are uninformed as to what fertilizer is and of what it consists, there has been a contention raised by some with reference to the guaranty of the manufacture of fertilizer. In addition, there has been undoubted misrepresentation. Section 15 begins by setting out that "the manufacture, sale, and distribution of commercial fertilizers * * * constitute one of the principal considerations of this offer." This emphasis makes this section the most important of the terms of the proposal, upon the violation of any of the terms of which the Attorney General may institute proceedings for the purpose of canceling and terminating the entire lease (see sec. 19).

With this acknowledgment that the manufacture and the sale of fertilizer is one of the principal considerations, "the company expressly agrees that continuously throughout the lease period" (then follows the standard business proviso in all contracts), "except as it may be prevented by reconstruction of the plant itself, or by war, strikes, accidents, fires, or other causes beyond its control, it will manufacture nitrogen and other commercial fertilizers, mixed or unmixed, and with or without filler, according to demand * * * using the most economical source of power available. The annual production of these fertilizers shall have a nitrogen content of at least 40,000 tons of fixed nitrogen * * *."

There is nothing whatever in this section that permits Mr. Ford to stop the manufacture of fertilizer at Muscle Shoals without violating a term of the contract which he has expressly indicated is the most important responsibility which he assumes. Should he fail in any year to manufacture an amount of fertilizer containing 40,000 tons of nitrogen, unless he had been prevented by any of the exceptions as set out above, he has violated a term of the contract, and the penalty is cancellation of the lease of the power. The failure to make 8 per cent profit, or the failure to make any profit, or the inability to manufacture this fertilizer at less than it is sold is not a "cause beyond its control" and would not give him the right to cease the manufacture of the full amount of fertilizer.

This statement is based upon the testimony of the Judge Advocate General's office of the War Department on page 186 of the House hearings:

"Mr. PARKER. Then it is a serious matter of doubt whether he would have to go on and have to dispose of the goods at a loss if the market price was below what he could make it for?

"Colonel HULL. He would have to do it unless relieved either by Congress or a court of equity.

"Mr. PARKER. But it says 'other causes beyond his control,' and the price of the goods on the market would be beyond his control.

"Colonel HULL. As I said, in my judgment the courts would not hold that price would be 'other causes beyond his control.'

"Mr. PARKER. You think not?

"Colonel HULL. No, sir."

Commercial fertilizers are nitrogen fertilizers, phosphate fertilizers, and potash fertilizers, or combinations of these materials suitable for use by farmers. Mr. Ford's proposal is to "manufacture nitrogen and other commercial fertilizers, mixed or unmixed and with or without filler, according to demand." "Other commercial fertilizers" must include phosphate or potash fertilizer ingredients, as distinguished from nitrogen commercial fertilizers. Mr. Ford will not fulfill his contract if in addition to the nitrogen fertilizers he does not produce either phosphate fertilizers or potash fertilizers, and the methods of producing phosphate fertilizers are well known, and the source of material is within 40 miles of Muscle Shoals plant in the Tennessee phosphate fields, and there are great possibilities in the production of potash from potash shales and other materials by the use of the electric furnace.

The nitrogen content of these fertilizers required to be manufactured—40,000 tons of fixed nitrogen—is simply a measure of the amount of nitrogen that shall be contained in these fertilizers. It must be borne in mind that this 40,000 tons of nitrogen is 100 per cent pure nitrogen. Nitrate of soda contains only 16 per cent of pure nitrogen, so that this 40,000 tons of pure nitrogen is equivalent to 250,000 tons of Chilean nitrate of soda, which is equal to the entire amount annually imported from Chile used by the farmers during the normal period just prior to the war, on which the farmers paid an export duty to Chile of $2,800,000. Ordinary mixed commercial fertilizers contain on an average less than 3 per cent of pure nitrogen. A fair figure for the average tonnage produced and consumed in the United States would be 2½ per cent of pure nitrogen content to each ton of fertilizer. The 40,000 tons at Muscle Shoals would furnish nitrogen for 1,600,000 tons of this average mixed commercial fertilizer. Furthermore, this is the minimum amount which Mr. Ford guarantees to make under his proposal; and, in addition to this content of nitrogen fertilizer, Mr. Ford agrees to make other commercial fertilizers, as we have shown above, which must necessarily increase the tonnage of fertilizer materials produced at Muscle Shoals under this contract.

To produce this amount of nitrogen at Muscle Shoals will require 100,000 continuous horsepower, using the process now provided there, or, should economy warrant changing this to the Haber electrolytic process, as advocated by the Ordnance officers, would require 125,000 continuous horsepower. The production of 110,000 tons of phosphoric acid, which amount would reasonably be required, "according to demand," to be combined with this 40,000 tons of pure nitrogen, will require 100,000 more of continuous horsepower. At Muscle Shoals, including the steam plants available, Mr. Ford secures only 240,000 continuous all the year around horsepower from the development covered by the contract, so that practically the entire amount of the continuous available horsepower at Muscle Shoals would, according to the contract, be utilized in the manufacture of fertilizer, without considering the power required for potash production, with regulation of profits agreed to and a board of farmers to determine the cost and regulate the price.

Very truly yours,

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
GRAY SILVER,
Washington Representative.

The ones most to be injured by a "joker" are the farmers, but they are the ones who drew up the language which, they are satisfied, protects them thoroughly. It is absurd to suppose that these interested parties would deliberately put a "joker" into the contract for the purpose of fooling themselves. No such thing is reasonable and no such thing was done.

PROFITS OF AMERICAN AGRICULTURAL CHEMICAL CO.

The farmers also know that these fertilizer people have made decidedly more than 8 per cent. In order that this House may know that the farmers are not mistaken, I would like to insert the record of just one of these fertilizer companies—not the largest one by any means. It is known as the American Agricultural Chemical Co.

The Secretary of War testified before our committee that the common stock of this concern was given as a free bonus to purchasers of preferred stock at par. An investment of $100 in their preferred stock in 1899 earned 46 per cent in the year 1918 alone, and since 1910 that $100 investment has earned a total of 243 per cent and has received a liberal dividend every year.

PROFITS IN THE FERTILIZER BUSINESS.

Secretary Weeks testified before the House Committee on Military Affairs (House hearings on Muscle Shoals, 1922, p. 29) that the American Agricultural Chemical Co. was organized about 20 years ago on a basis of "giving to every stockholder a share of preferred stock and a half share of common stock for $100." The par value of both kinds of stock was $100, so that this amounted to selling the preferred at par with the common as a free bonus.

The earnings of a $100 investment, therefore, were the earnings on one share of preferred stock plus the earnings on one-half share of common stock. Both having the same par value, the earnings were as follows:

Year.	On preferred.[1]	On common.[1]	Total earnings on a $100 investment.

Colonel Hull testified before our committee February 10, 1922:

A careful study of the language convinces me that Mr. Ford is bound as well as the company, and he is not discharged the minute the company is organized and undertakes these matters. * * * Mr. Ford obligates his estate and the company when organized.

LEGAL FEATURES OF FORD OFFER PREPARED BY JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL—FERTILIZER FEATURES PREPARED BY FARMERS' REPRESENTATIVES.

The Standard Dictionary defines a guaranty as "the act of making sure." Mr. Ford in drafting his offer left nothing undone to make sure that his proposal would be carried out. As Colonel Hull testified, the guaranty clause of the Ford proposal was prepared in the office of the Judge Advocate General. Mr. Mayo, representing Mr. Ford before our committee, testified that the clause which gives the consumer the right to examine the Ford Company's books and see for themselves that his profits were limited to 8 per cent on the fair actual annual cost of production, was written by the representatives of the farm organizations themselves. It may be of interest to state that at no time throughout the negotiations did Mr. Ford have an attorney to look after his interests. As Mr. Ford publicly stated when making his proposal, he placed his offer in the hands of the farmers on the one hand and in the hands of the Government on the other.

But what sort of "joker" have these fertilizer interests—these self-appointed guardians of the welfare of the farmer—been perpetrating for these past years, coming forward as they now do and suggesting that Mr. Ford has a "joker" in his contract? They appear to be well acquainted with "jokers," and such we find to be the case.

18,888 DIFFERENT BRANDS OF FERTILIZER.

The Members of this House will recall that in 1916 the Federal Trade Commission made a report on the fertilizer industry. Among all industries of the country the one which has taken the lead in employing sharp practices for the purpose of confusing its customers regarding its products is the fertilizer industry, for this report shows that in the season of 1914 in four Southern States the fertilizer industry had registered no less than 18,888 different brands of fertilizer. (Federal Trade Commission Report on the Fertilizer Industry, 1916, p. 219.) What could be more confusing to the farmer trying to improve his soil and make a crop, or what could be more favorable to a sharp trader trying to give him as little as possible for his money, than to have available more than 18,000 different brands of fertilizer to choose from? To find the proverbial needle in the haystack would be child's play in comparison with choosing the correct fertilizer from such an assortment and knowing that you had the right one when you got it.

18,000 LITTLE "JOKERS."

This is the industry which was forced by the laws of all the principal fertilizer-using States to label the goods which it sold to its customers, and this is the industry which now comes forward to protect the farmer from injury at the hands of Henry Ford, who, they say, is attempting to deceive the farmer when he tells him that at Muscle Shoals he will undertake to reduce the cost of fertilizer. When he makes this statement these fertilizer people maintain that there must be a "joker" in the Ford offer.

The facts are that when Henry Ford put in his offer for Muscle Shoals, 18,000 little "jokers" got the shimmies, and those responsible for this army of "jokers" are merely trying to confuse the issue by raising a false alarm. Out of their own knowledge of the development of the air-fixation nitrate industry and the application of the electric furnace for the production of phosphoric acid, they very well know that the successful solution of the fertilizer problem at Muscle Shoals is a matter of capital and they also know that Henry Ford has the money and the disposition to use it in the interest of the farmer.

This is no mere assumption, for the president of the National Fertilizer Association stated in his address before the last annual meeting of the association:

There is a probability that a concentrated phosphoric acid can be made with cheap power at Muscle Shoals at less than it could be made there by the sulphuric-acid method—and in that admission is the explanation of their alarm.

CAN THE FERTILIZER ASSOCIATION BANK ON THE SENATE?

The secretary of this fertilizer association in his last annual report shows a remarkable confidence that this Congress will protect the vested interests when the issue is between them and the farmer, for he says:

Certainly the Muscle Shoals bill will not be passed by this session of Congress, we may bank on that, although it may pass the House.

I am glad that he has to admit that the friends of agriculture are in the majority in this House, but it is my opinion that any man who undertakes to bank on the United States Senate to favor special interests and deny to agriculture the opportunity that is offered in the Ford proposal is reckoning without his host. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in the limited time at my disposal it would be impossible for me to discuss the bill, to tell my objections to it, and why I am against certain provisions, especially those providing for the number of enlisted men and officers in the Army. Therefore the few minutes that I have at my disposal I shall devote to making a few observations touching the ingenious speech by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

Mr. Chairman, I was sorry, indeed, that my friend was willing to lend his eloquent voice to such an obnoxious cause. The distinguished gentleman first made some statements of fact which I must contradict. He stated that the States of the South were openly violating the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States. For his benefit—and he is an able lawyer—I hope the gentleman will read Williams v. State of Mississippi, One hundred and seventieth United States Supreme Court Reports, and see that Mississippi is upheld in her constitution by the highest court of this land; and the other Southern States have followed that State, and they are functioning legally and constitutionally.

Then he says that the eighteenth amendment, devoting 45 minutes of his time to that subject, can not be enforced, and therefore it should be repealed. It occurs to me that a man of his age who served on this floor at various times for 40 years could well lend his eloquence to a better cause. The people of the United States after many years of struggle put upon the organic law the eighteenth amendment. All of the States of this Union except four ratified it. Forty-four States out of forty-eight ratified the eighteenth amendment. Yet the gentleman from New York and a few others will stand upon the floor of this House and even go out over the country speaking, stating that the eighteenth amendment and the legislation enforcing it should be nullified; and these are men who have been honored by the people, men who have been placed here with a commission in their hands, in part, at least, to represent 110,000,000 souls. They would want to do away with that sort of legislation and do away with the moral effect of it and again put this Government and her God-fearing people back in partnership with the manufacturers of beer, wine, and whiskies, and in the nefarious traffic and the trail of slime and crime that follows it.

The gentleman from New York and his cohorts claim they want light wine and beer. I know what they really mean: They want strong whisky and heavy wines and alcoholic beer.

Is it possible that men holding such honorable positions would want again to place the people of the United States in an attitude where the boys and girls who are growing up and those yet to be born would be debauched by the same methods that they were before the law went into effect? Yet we have it advocated on the floor of this House. The God-fearing Christian women of this country have been given the ballot since the eighteenth amendment was put on, and yet men will stand up and advocate that the prohibition amendment and legislation be repealed when 44 out of 48 States ratified that amendment, and if the good women had been able, by law, to vote I believe it would have been ratified by the other 4 States. So it occurs to me in advocating the repeal of the prohibition amendment—and restore the liquor traffic and debauchery—it is a slap in the face of womanhood, the morality and the godliness of the good people of the United States of America. That dreaded demon has put its curse in many of the homes of this Republic and now we have the remedy in the organic law and the legislation to enforce that law on the books, and it occurs to me that whether a man's appetite calls for liquor or not he would want to enforce that law and he would want to drive the manufacture of intoxicating liquors, the use of it, the drinking of it, the bartering, from the borders of the United States and even the soil over which our flag floats. We can not expect to have the people in the byways and hedges to respect the law if the men in high places do not respect it. [Applause.] That those who have the mission of a Congressman would want to stand up and say "Do away with this law, stamp it under your feet," and say you can not legislate against the appetites of a few people and therefore you should repeal this amendment to the Constitution and repeal all the legislation to enforce it is strange to me. It seems to me that a man who goes before the country with this responsibility resting upon him in the sight of his God and his fellow man would stop and think before he would advocate such an awful thing. Is it possible that after the people of the United States have fought from the church doors, from the fireside of every hamlet and every rural district, every town, and every city of this Republic to bring about this legislation that a few people in a few different States should ask a great political party to put itself under that corrupt, slimy banner and go staggering down to a drunkard's grave. God forbid. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ].

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the subject of the rivers and harbors bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the rivers and harbors bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Gentlemen, the matter to which I wish to direct your attention at this time is a news article appearing in the Washington Post of January 15, 1923, reading in part as follows:

It was learned that Isadore B. Dockweiler, Democratic national committeeman from California, has been in Washington procuring a mailing list of members of the American Legion. At the same time he has been making personal contact with officers of the Legion known to have Democratic leanings and with Republicans known to be disgruntled over the veto of the bonus bill by President Harding.

FOR BONUS-TARIFF SPEECH.

It is assumed the mailing list is desired for the circulation of the bonus-tariff speech of Mr. McAdoo delivered at Fullerton, Calif., last armistice day. It was recently printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which makes it available for mailing without cost.

The bill authorizing the issuance of a charter to the American Legion was passed by the Sixty-sixth Congress. This measure—granting a charter to the Legion—was the first act of its kind. Congress had always declined—had refused—to issue such a charter even to the Grand Army of the Republic, but the position was taken that this was the greatest war of all time; that there were no precedent for such legislation, and therefore we should charter the American Legion. Nevertheless the Committee on the Judiciary, of which I had the honor to be a member, recommended the charter, but incorporated in the bill, which Congress enacted into law, the following provision:

SEC. 6. That the organization shall be nonpolitical and, as an organization, shall not promote the candidacy of any person seeking public office.

The executive officers of the American Legion owe it to the country and to the great body of men who constitute the membership of that group to come forward with a statement, either corroborating or denying the allegations of the newspaper article that I have read before you, as to whether or not the American Legion is being used as an instrument to carry on political propaganda in the interest of an individual candidate of a particular party for office, high or low. Officials of the Legion, I respectfully submit, should—concerning the charge—explain without delay. The time has arrived when the American Legion should demonstrate to the country whether or not the charge is mere fiction or if, to the contrary, it proposes to forfeit its charter as a result of being a mere political tool.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I do.

Mr. BLANTON. If the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia, or anybody else, would ask them for a list of their membership, would the giving of the list to the gentleman be a participation in politics?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Yes; certainly. The furnishing of the list of members has heretofore been refused to all candidates of every party; and if in the face of the express language of a statute mandatory in form the Legion officers should constitute themselves as an instrument working at the behest and to the advantage of a political candidate for office the membership of the Legion ought to know the fact and kick them out of office; and it is up to such executive officers to present to the public a statement on the subject. When the bill proposing the charter was pending it was argued that the great body of men proposed to be incorporated would become a powerful factor in politics, and that therefore a charter should not be granted. Such argument was brushed aside, but we did take the precaution to insert in the bill a provision that they should not, as an organization, promote the candidacy of any person seeking public office.

If the officers of the Legion have furnished to Dockweiler, agent of McAdoo, a list of members for his use in contesting with Cox, of Ohio, and Bryan, of Florida, they are guilty of violating the provisions of a statute that was enacted by Congress in the interest of the Nation's defenders; they have prostituted a patriotic act to an ignoble purpose. Let them explain.

If the newspaper report be all fiction, let us have the facts. One thing we confidently believe, and that is that neither W. G. McAdoo, Henry Ford, James M. Cox, nor William J. Bryan have an absolute mortgage on the organization known as the American Legion.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, there is in the membership of this House no Member more honorable, more truthful, more sincere, more fearless, or more upright than the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW]. There is no Member who has in his heart a greater amount of the milk of human kindness, of love for his fellow man, than has the distinguished Member from Georgia. The snappy snarl of a modern Baltimorean self-designated mother wolf, such as the one who suckled Remus and Romulus of famous mythical Rome, can not deter him or stand in the way of the progressive Christian civilization of this great Republic.

And neither can the speech of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] destroy him or his usefulness. Such a speech as was made by the gifted gentleman from New York does more harm and throws in the way of the President in law enforcement more obstacles than the plying of their hellish trade by all the bootleggers throughout the United States put together. He not only encourages them but many others to join them. He speaks of his having voted $8,000,000 to the President to enforce this law. I suggested to him that his speech this afternoon does more harm than $80,000,000 worth of law enforcement will be able to combat.

Such speeches ought to stop. The gentleman said that in the great State of Texas anything is possible. He asserted that the Constitution is not enforced there with respect to the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments. I cite to him my colleague from Texas [Mr. WURZBACH], from San Antonio. He will tell you that both the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments are enforced in the State of Texas. He will tell you that there were about a thousand negroes who voted in his district in the city of San Antonio during the last primary elections. Those two amendments are not violated in the State of Texas any more than any other amendments are violated. But, thank God, in the State of Texas we have a governor who has never yet made a statement like the one he quoted from the Governor of New York, "that so far as beer and light wine are concerned they are going to continue no matter what becomes of the Constitution and the law." Thank God, from the State of Texas we have not a single Member of Congress who would dare to make a speech like that made to-day by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], because every Member from the State of Texas believes as his constituents do in upholding the Constitution and the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KINDRED].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated by him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the New York Academy of Medicine has recently very fittingly celebrated the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of that great humanitarian and scientist, Louis Pasteur. The word "pasteurized" alone, which has become a word of common household use, immortalizes the name and the great services to humanity of Louis Pasteur. This process of pasteurization, meaning simply the process of boiling suspected milk, liquids, and food, as discovered by Pasteur and prescribed by him, has saved the lives of millions of babies and adults.

Pasteur also was the originator and father of the great science of bacteriology, which established the basis of vaccine-therapy and the prevention and cure of hydrophobia, typhoid fever, and many other diseases, the fatality of which have been so greatly decreased by Pasteur's methods. It is due to the genius of this great scientist that so many millions of lives have thus been saved in the past and will be saved in the future.

I think, therefore, that it is fitting that I, as a physician, should pay some tribute to the life and work of this matchless man of science.

He was born at Dole, France, in a little house in the Rue des Tanneurs, December 17, 1822. His father was a noncommissioned officer of the Empire who had been created Chevalier of the Legion of Honor on the battle field; his mother, the daughter of simple market gardeners.

His first school was the Ecole Primaire, and later, at the College of Arbois, where he was merely an average pupil, with a marked taste for drawing, his career pointing rather to that of the artist than the scientist. However, the principal of the college advised him to enter Ecole Normale Superieure, and in 1839 he left the College of Arbois for that of Besancon, and it was here that he commenced the study of chemistry.

In 1849 he was appointed to the chair of chemistry of the faculty of Strasbourg, and on May 29 of the same year he was united in marriage to Mlle. Marie Laurent, daughter of the rector of the Academy of Strasbourg. He pursued the study of science diligently, and in September, 1854, he was nominated as professor and dean of the recently created faculty at Lille, where he served three years with distinction. In 1857 he was nominated as administrator of the Ecole Normale, also subdirector of science studies.

Stated briefly, the dates of his greater scientific triumphs are: In 1857, fermentations; 1860, spontaneous generation; 1865, diseases of wine and beer; 1868, diseases of silkworms; 1881, virus and vaccines; 1885, prophylaxis against rabies.

On July 6, 1885, he made his first successful operation for rabies on a child named Joseph Meister, describing it in an article read to the Academy of Science and Medicine on October 26–27, 1885, entitled, "Method of Preventing Rabies After a Bite."

I could hardly state in more appropriate terms some of the long list of facts relative to Pasteur and his inestimable services to humanity and science than to quote from an article appearing in the New Republic, of date January 17, 1923, contributed by Nicholas and Lillian Kopeloff, as follows:

Pasteur is being honored as perhaps the greatest scientific genius of all time. In the age of experimentation which marks man's mastery over his environment he was a pioneer. To him bacteriology, that science which permeates every aspect of health and disease, owes its very existence. To-day we are so familiar with bacteria as to contemptuously call them "bugs." We no longer pay them the courtesy of complete destruction, but have gauged their individual threats much as the finished boxer scorns to flee the blow which he so skillfully and imperceptibly turns aside. Indeed, it is a far stretch of the imagination to reconstruct that time 100 years ago when the activities of bacteria were unknown. The doctrine of spontaneous generation was solidly established and sanctified by tradition. This was no more nor less than the belief that living organisms could be produced from inanimate matter. Thus, Van Helmont in the sixteenth century gave a celebrated prescription for the creation of mice from dirty linen and a few grains of wheat or pieces of cheese. Similarly, all fermentation and all putrefaction were regarded as being strictly chemical phenomena.

Pasteur's brilliant experiments demonstrated conclusively the true nature of these everyday processes. Their simplicity is confounding. He began by a microscopic study of the air. "If germs exist in the atmosphere," he said, "could they not be arrested on their way?" Thereupon he drew a current of air through a tube plugged with cotton which contained sterilized broth. There was deposited on the cotton considerable detritus, in which were revealed bacteria upon microscopic examination. The nutritive fluid, thus protected, did not putrefy, but upon dropping some of the shreds of cotton into it putrefaction promptly set in. Not content with this experiment, he wished to show that sterilized liquids would remain uncontaminated even in contact with air, provided that the entrance of dust particles was prohibited. This was accomplished by devising flasks the necks of which had been drawn out into fine tubes bent in the form of a U. The ends of the U being left open permitted the sedimentation of dust from the air as far as the lowest angle of the tube, but no dust was carried up the second arm into the liquid. In such flasks no putrefaction occurred, but it could be induced by the simple expedient of slanting the entire apparatus until the liquid ran into the bent arm of the tube, where the dust particles containing bacteria had collected. Finally he took flasks containing sterilized fluid to different heights above sea level, climbing mountains and glaciers, and showed that the purer the air the less contamination took place.

Here was definite proof that putrefaction and decay were not the resultants of "spontaneous generation," but were the by-products of chemical decomposition caused by the metabolic activities of microorganisms. Not only did he point out that these fermentations were caused by microorganisms, but he investigated the spoilage of these products, discovering that bitterness or greasiness was due to a special ferment. In fact, the town of Arbois, famous for its Jura red and white wines, placed an impromptu laboratory at Pasteur's disposal during the holidays of 1864, so that he might discover the remedy for the acidity which ruined their "rosy and tawny wines." Pasteur's reply is characteristic of the modesty which has become proverbial. "This spontaneous offer from a town dear to me for so many reasons," he wrote the mayor and town council, "does too much honor to my modest labors, and the way in which it is made covers me with confusion." Accordingly he refused it, fearing his services might not be proportionate to their generosity. He preferred to camp out with his curators in an old coffee room at the entrance to the town, where they contented themselves with apparatus of the most primitive description, generally made by some local tinker or even blacksmith. And this problem terminated in the procedure which makes of his name an immortal adjective: "Pasteurized." He discovered that by heating the wines for a few moments at a moderately high temperature, 135° F. (212° being the boiling point of water), their good keeping qualities were assured. The principle of a short preliminary heating is now universally applied to milk in order to safeguard it against spoilage.

Pasteur is of the soil, and it is fitting therefore that he should have rendered agriculture inestimable service. Turning his attention to vinegar making he was soon embroiled with Liebig, the great German chemist, as to the very nature of this biological process. The latter contended that microorganisms were not responsible for the production of vinegar from beechwood chips, whereas Pasteur demonstrated that it was due to the presence of mycoderma aceti, which grew on the chips or wood shavings. Similarly he discovered the organisms which produce lactic and butyric fermentation.

His greatest contribution, however, was in behalf of the silk industry. In 1864–65 the silk districts of that region of France known as the Midi suffered such serious losses that the yield of cocoons fell from 26,000,000 to 4,000,000 kilograms, which entailed a loss of $20,000,000 and caused widespread distress and poverty. An epidemic had broken out among the silkworms—that dread disease known as pebrine. Pasteur was employed by the stricken districts and the Minister of Agriculture to undertake an investigation. After several years of study, he found the organism causing the disease, suggested remedies, and brought back wealth to the ruined communities. But this was at the cost of impaired health and a partial stroke of paralysis.

It is due to Pasteur's memorable researches that bacteria and their microscopic allies emerged from their relative obscurity as organisms chiefly of interest to the professional biologist, and achieved a conspicuous position in natural science as a group of organisms whose activities were full of a far-reaching significance for all mankind. This opens the most spectacular chapter of his achievements, the one which has brought him universal recognition. Lord Lister, who devised the methods in surgery which rob it of so many of its former terrors, thus addressed Pasteur, whose ideas had inspired that work at the latter's jubilee celebration in 1892: "Truly there does not exist in the entire world any individual to whom the medical sciences owe more than they do to you. Your researches on fermentation have thrown a powerful beam, which has lightened the baleful darkness of surgery, and has transformed the treatment of wounds from a matter of uncertain and too often disastrous empiricism into a scientific art of sure beneficence. Thanks to you, surgery has undergone a complete revolution, which has deprived it of its terrors and has extended almost without limit its efficacious power." Prior to Pasteur's contributions, the mortality from blood-poisoning, gangrene, and other infections following surgery and childbirth was extremely high. This condition was summed up in the famous words of Valpeau, "the prick of a pin is the open door to death." To-day, what with the sterilization of instruments, sponges, ligatures; in a word, everything which comes in contact with the patient, a surgical operation is only a surgical operation, and not a preliminary to death by blood-poisoning.

It would be a difficult task to enumerate all the contributions to science made by Pasteur. Trained as a chemist, his initial researches dealt with the problems of the formation of molecules and their optical activities, as in his experiments with racemic and tartaric acids. These led him into a study of fermentation, which is essentially the decomposition of sugars through bacterial agencies. Mention has already been made of his fundamental work in establishing the existence and activities of bacteria, but one point requires further emphasis. Pasteur discovered that certain microorganisms could be active in the absence of free oxygen. This radically upset the conception of metabolic processes then prevalent since it was believed until that time that life could be supported only when a free supply of oxygen obtained. Yet here were these anaerobes, simple microorganisms, as incontrovertible proof.

Pasteur's notable investigations of anthrax, that dreaded disease, that dreaded disease which lurks in unsterilized shaving brushes, improperly tanned hides, etc.; of chicken cholera and of swine fever, which produce serious epidemics, culminated in the preparation of vaccines which are fundamental to our present knowledge of immunity.

The most spectacular application of this work has been to hydrophobia or rabies. This disease is one which primarily attacks animals, being most prevalent among the carnivora—dogs, cats, and wolves. But man is also subject to this disease, principally through the entrance of the saliva of rabid animals by bites or scratches. "Rabies is prevalent to an alarming extent in all civilized countries except England, where the careful supervision of dogs, enforcement of muzzling laws, and rigid legislation regarding the importation of dogs have caused a practical eradication of the disease in that country. The treatment, which is now prophylatically applied to patients with or suspected of infection with rabies, has been but little altered either in principle or in technical detail since it was first worked out by Pasteur." This consists of an active immunization with virus, i. e., the administration of gradually increasing doses of the actual virus capable of causing hydrophobia, but which has been attenuated by dryings. The body reacts by the formation of antibodies which combat the virus. The injections are continued until a strongly virulent virus produces no untoward effects. This indicates that the body has acquired an immunity capable of neutralizing the original virus introduced by the rabid animal. The efficiency of the Pasteur treatment for rabies is no longer problematical. Over 50,000 individuals have been treated within 10 years with an average mortality of 1 per cent.

The sweeping change wrought by Pasteur in all conceptions of disease has been forcibly characterized by Tyndall: "We have been scourged by invisible thongs, attacked from impenetrable ambuscades, and it is only to-day that the light of science is being let in upon the murderous domains of our foes." The master mind of Pasteur has dominated the realm of bacteriology since 1860. "His epoch-making discoveries were largely due to his intuitive vision, his skill in device, and in the adaptation of means to ends, his prodigious industry, and the enthusiasm and love with which he inspired his associates." His aphorism, "It is characteristic of science and progress that they continually open new fields to our vision," is indicative of his own life-work. Each advance in bacteriology is an added monument to his achievements. No one can fail to be inspired by the personality which made it possible. Vallery-Radot has immortalized it in the Life of Pasteur, and others have done him homage. But Pasteur belongs not to the biographers, not to the bacteriologists, not even to adoring France; he belongs to humanity for all time.

"The debt of biology, the debt of medicine, the debt of all science to Pasteur is a debt to that indefinable breath of which Renan spoke. No one branch of science can claim a monopoly of Pasteur's genius."

Reviewing from the vantage point of to-day the position which Pasteur occupies in the history of science, free now from the shocks to prejudice and superstition which followed in apparently endless succession from his work, it would seem that the greatest expression of his genius lay in the glorification of scientific method—observation, deduction, experimental proof—through these things his life work, in the words of Renan again, "is like unto a luminous track in the great night of the infinitesimally small, in that last abyss where life is found."

How is it possible to put in a few words an adequate expression of the debt of biology to Pasteur? A consummate master of the method of science; not a medical man, yet by his achievements establishing medicine in all its branches on a scientific foundation; not a biologist, yet by sheer force of scientific method able to shape and to securely place the keystone in the arch of our conceptions of living nature. And what a model for all men was his tolerance of the shabby quarters in the garret of the Ecole Normale in the Rue d'Ulm. Here, surely, he demonstrated the fact that achievement is not the reflected radiance of a palace of research but comes from within.

"Wherever he went," says Duclaux, "Pasteur was an initiator. Guided by an imagination so adventurous and at the same time so well controlled, we are constantly on the borders of new countries, but we journey in security." His mind worked progressively, always building a new edifice on the foundation of a principle which he had previously demonstrated. We irresistibly look back on his final achievements in preventive medicine to his earlier work on splenic fever, and from this, still back to that inspiration—the germ theory of disease—which grew up with his investigations on the cause and prevention of silkworm epidemics. Here again a great generalization was but the crystallization in a mind saturated with varied conceptions of the activities of minute organisms responsible, as he had shown, for the multiple phenomena of fermentation. And who shall say that the explanation of these phenomena was not the outcome of his early work on the rotary power of crystals and molecular dissymmetry?

Most of Pasteur's great discoveries were the results of investigations undertaken in response to economic or human needs. So it was with fermentation. * * * As a result of these experiments, a new road was opened, a road which was to lead him to some of the most important discoveries in the history of science.

* * * * * * *

Pasteur's solution of the problem of fermentation is typical of all his work. He struck first at the widely accepted view that fermentations are due to unknown molecular forces. He demonstrated experimentally, first with lactic fermentation, that different kinds of activities of similar nature are brought about through the vital activities of living organisms, and he showed that each type is dependent upon its own specific kind of microorganism. Nor was he content to rest here. His clear thinking mind reached beyond the horizon of fermentations to the intricate play of living things whereby the equilibrium of nature is maintained. He saw the part played by microorganisms in putrefaction and decomposition; he saw how, through their activities, the protein matter, and all substances composing the bodies of animals and plants, are ultimately reduced to ammonia, carbon dioxide, mineral salts, and water, and restored to the earth to be taken up by green plants where, through photosynthesis, they are brought back again to the realm of living protoplasm. He thus added the physical basis of life to Helmholz's principle of the conservation of energy and gave to biology for the first time a sense of the marvelous cycle of matter and energy in living nature.

His studies on fermentation opened up a new series of problems. On every side arose the inevitable question: Whence come these minute living organisms? Do they develop spontaneously, or do they come from preexisting organisms like themselves? In all ages spontaneous generation has been the refuge of the uninformed and the hopelessly ignorant. Even as late as the seventeenth century eels, salamanders, lizards, flies, bees, and various other forms of life were regarded as originating by spontaneous generation, and we find a noted chemist of that day gravely handing down to us an infallible recipe for making mice: "Place a piece of soiled linen in a vessel; add a few grains of corn; flavor with a bit of cheese; and in 21 days the mice will be there, fully adult and of both sexes." Such views strike us as too silly for belief. But in those days tradition and superstition were powerful factors which few dared to question. Redi, and later Vallisneri, both Italian physicians, were among the first to doubt and to follow up their doubts with experiments. The former proved that flies would not develop from rotting meat if the latter is covered properly by gauze. He noted that flies, attracted no doubt by the odor of meat, deposit eggs on the covering gauze. He saw that larvæ develop from the eggs, and flies from the larvæ. Vallisneri proved that the wormlike grub found in fruit does not develop from the fruit, but from an egg deposited there by an insect. Little by little the old traditions were replaced by facts, and so far as these larger animals are concerned, the theory of spontaneous generation was abandoned.

In 1675, however, the world of microscopic life was opened up by the Dutch naturalist, Leeuwenhoek. Minute living things were found to develop in pure rain water as well as in all moisture where organic matter is present. How could their origin be explained save through spontaneous generation? The old tradition, reenforced, came back, and experiments analogous to those of Redi and Vallisneri in the hands of Buffon, Needham, Pouchet, Joly, Bastian, and others, appeared to verify it. Other experiments, with conclusions opposed to spontaneous generation by Spallanzani, Schultze, Schwann, and others, were incomplete and failed to carry conviction. The idea that specific living germs are present in the air was inconceivable and partisans of spontaneous generation certainly had the best of it in argument. "We are mindful," they would say, "of a certain experiment of Gay-Lussac, where a small amount of the must of grapes when brought in contact with a few bubbles of air, would begin to ferment. You say these bubbles brought with them some germs of yeast, but they must bring something else. How could a bubble of air bring germs of yeast into one fluid, something else into an infusion of hay, and still other things into a meat infusion? That makes a great many germs." Pouchet added, "The air, thus peopled, would have the density of iron."

Armed with his previous experience, Pasteur was ready. With infinite patience, experiments were planned and carried out. Nutrient but sterile media in sealed flasks, exposed to heated or filtered air, in the great majority of cases remained sterile; so too, when exposed to rarefied mountain air. From his discussions with Pouchet and Joly, there followed the conclusive proof that germs are present in the air we breathe; from his discussions with Bastian came the proof that solids and liquids, as well as the air, are carriers of germs. It was from these discussions, particularly from those with Bastian, that the modern technique in bacteriology and in surgery has been developed.

The ghost of spontaneous generation, however, was not yet laid. Notwithstanding the fact that the media used by Pasteur were apparently sterile, and the air supplied was germ free, an active development of microorganisms occurred now and then. Such exceptions were eagerly seized by his opponents as evidence that in these flasks only were the proper conditions for spontaneous generation provided. Pasteur's experience had not brought to light the fact that the spores of some organisms have the power to resist prolonged heating at high temperatures which kill actively living germs. This fact was later demonstrated for the first time by Jeffries Wyman. These heat-resistant germs were the cause of fermentation in Gay-Lussac's must of grapes; they developed in Pouchet's sterilized hay infusion, and they were present in Bastian's samples. Gay-Lussac affirmed the phenomena to be due to oxygen; Pouchet and Bastian to spontaneous generation; Pasteur to germs of the air. All were mistaken. Later, it was shown that the heat-resisting spores develop only in the presence of air. Pasteur was right so far as the presence of the germ was concerned; Gay-Lussac so far as the need of oxygen was concerned; Pouchet and Bastian were hopelessly wrong.

Pasteur was by no means satisfied with his incomplete demonstration that, like high organisms, all types of germs are derived from germs similar to themselves. He was planning further extensive experiments in this direction when he was called upon to undertake a new and an entirely different type of work. The great silk industry of southern France, already vastly reduced, was threatened with complete ruin by a deadly epidemic among the silkworms. Pasteur was asked to investigate the disease and if possible to provide a remedy. This is the point in Pasteur's career where, if at all, we can draw the line between his achievements in general biology and those in preventive medicine. During the six years from 1865 which he devoted to the silkworm problem there gradually developed in his mind the conviction that many human diseases are due to microorganisms. Duclaux writes of this period: "* * * Nothing can be more curious than to see Pasteur at close quarters with a bristling complicated problem, beginning by being deceived about it, by seeing things the wrong side to, but led back continuously to the truth by experiment, and ending by unraveling all the complications. I do not know a more beautiful example of scientific investigation. It is the first camp on a route wherein he found immortality; the earlier discoveries had given him only glory."

Pasteur's last summer was spent at Villeneuve-l'Etang, where he passed away on Saturday, September 28, 1895.

Valery-Radot, his son-in-law, quotes Pasteur as saying on one occasion: "A man of science should think of what will be said of him in the following century, not of the insults or the praise of one day."

In commemorating Pasteur's one hundredth birthday this year, audiences throughout the world will know nothing of the insults, but in this "following century" will unite in one great wave of praise. He did become a teacher, as his father so ardently wished, not indeed in the college at Arbois, not only in the universities of Strasbourg, Lille, or at the Ecole Normale, but a teacher at whose feet the civilized world still sits in grateful appreciation.

Perhaps the most notable of all the praise conferred upon Pasteur was bestowed on the occasion of his reception into the Academie Francaise by Ernest Renan, who on this occasion addressed the following words to Pasteur:

"That common basis of all beautiful and true work, that divine fire, that indefinable breath which inspires science, literature, and art, we have found it in you. Sir, it is genius."

The commemoration of Pasteur's one hundredth anniversary by the New York Academy of Medicine, including as it does an exhibition of a rare collection of photographs of Pasteur and of the surroundings amid which he lived and did his great work, is in itself one of the greatest tributes that could be paid to any man, even to one of Pasteur's matchless humanitarian and scientific achievements.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CALDER. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] is exceedingly anxious to have a House bridge bill passed, which I report back favorably from the Committee on Commerce with amendments. It is the bill (H. R. 11626) to extend the time for constructing a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Baton Rouge, La. I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments were, in line 6, to strike out the words "three years" and insert "one year," and in line 7, before the word "years," to strike out the word "six" and insert "three," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the bridge authorized by the act of Congress approved July 17, 1914, to be built across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Baton Rouge, La., are hereby extended one year and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENTS OF INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. McKELLAR submitted an amendment proposing to strike from the bill the exception that six officers or employees of the United States Shipping Board or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation may be paid a salary or compensation at the rate of not to exceed $25,000 per annum each and two not to exceed $20,000 each, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 13696, the independent offices appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

He also submitted sundry amendments providing that passenger-carrying vehicles of the United States Veterans' Bureau, the United States Shipping Board, the Potomac Park office buildings, the Smithsonian Institution, the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, the Housing Corporation, the General Accounting Office, the Civil Service Commission, and the Alien Property Custodian either shall be sold in the manner now prescribed by law and the proceeds covered into the Treasury or the appropriations therefor stricken out, or both, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 13696, the independent offices appropriation bill, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13593) making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes; requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. SLEMP, Mr. MADDEN, Mr. OGDEN, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. CARTER were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. J. Res. 251) providing for the filling of two vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate to the Post Office appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13593) making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. STERLING, Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. McKELLAR, and Mr. HARRIS conferees on the part of the Senate.

TAXATION OF STOCK DIVIDENDS.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Resolution 409 submitted by me on yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate Resolution 409, which, for the information of the Senate, the Secretary will report.

The Assistant Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 409) submitted yesterday by Mr. BROOKHART, as follows:

Whereas the Federal Trade Commission reports 328 corporations have released surpluses by the stock-dividend plan during the calendar year 1922, reaching more than $2,149,151,425;

Whereas section 220, revenue act approved November 23, 1921, provides:

"That if any corporation, however created or organized, is formed or availed of for the purpose of preventing the imposition of the surtax upon its stockholders or members through the medium of permitting its gains and profits to accumulate instead of being divided or distributed, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of such corporation a tax equal to 25 per cent of the amount thereof, which shall be in addition to the tax imposed by section 230 of this title, and shall be computed, collected, and paid upon the same basis and in the same manner and subject to the same provisions of law, including penalties, as that tax": Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby requested to furnish the Senate with the names of companies, amounts, and dates of penalties, if any, imposed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue during said year of 1922, pursuant to the provisions of section 220, Internal Revenue Laws of 1921.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand the consideration of the resolution will take no time?

Mr. BROOKHART. I understand that it will not.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask the Senator from Iowa if it is the purpose of the resolution ultimately to make public the income-tax returns of individuals?

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that the resolution applies only to stock dividends.

Mr. BROOKHART. The resolution will apply only to those who have been punished by the imposition of penalties pursuant to law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

RURAL MARKETING AND CREDIT FACILITIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4280) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States, to amend the Federal reserve act, to amend the Federal farm loan act, to extend and stabilize the market for United States bonds and other securities, to provide fiscal agents for the United States, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 10, in lines 1 and 2, it is proposed to strike out the words "such obligation is by its terms made payable" and to insert "its principal office is located," so that if amended as proposed the clause will read:

SEC. 6. Any corporation organized under the provisions of this act may take, receive, reserve, and charge on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidence of debt, interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the State in which its principal office is located.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I have already stated the reasons why I think this change should be made, and I do not care now to elaborate them. I will merely add that my belief is that if the provision remains in the bill as now drawn it will mean that if any corporations are organized under the bill—and I assume that some will be organized—they will be organized in financial centers and make their paper payable in the high interest rate States, for that will be allowable under the proposed law. It seems to be a very anomalous and extraordinary provision that if a farmer or stock raiser in Virginia should negotiate for a loan with one of these corporations in New York, the corporation could make the note payable in Nebraska, for instance. I do not know what the rate of interest in Nebraska is, but I merely assume that the interest rate there may be 12 per cent. That would be the kind of transaction which would be permitted under this proposed act as it now reads. I think that the rate of interest in the State in which the principal office of the corporation is located should be the rate of interest fixed or, as suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], it might read "the State where the borrower resides." I should not have any objection to that; but it does seem to me that the provision as now drawn is unusual and is not justified. I have no further comment to make on it.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not object to that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. On page 12, in line 17, after the word "organized," I suggest an amendment by adding the words "or doing business." The purpose of that amendment is to allow corporations already existing to qualify under this proposed act, but if the provision is limited to those organized under the act they would not be included.

Mr. McLEAN. It might be assumed that corporations already organized could qualify, but I have no objection to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. At the top of page 13, line 1, there is a mere clerical error, which I think should be corrected. The word "corporations" in that line ought to be "corporation" in order to make the language grammatical.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, we now come to an important section of the bill—section 9—which provides:

SEC. 9. That no corporation organized under this act, except corporations with powers limited, as provided in section 8, shall commence business until it has deposited with the Federal reserve bank of the district wherein it has its principal place of business, bonds or other obligations of the United States in an aggregate face amount at least 25 per cent of its paid-in capital stock.

I wish to propose an amendment, after the word "business," in line 22, to insert the words "Federal farm loan" and to strike out the word "other" in that line, so as to read:

Deposited with the Federal reserve bank of the district wherein it has its principal place of business Federal farm-loan bonds or obligations of the United States in an aggregate face amount of at least 25 per cent of its paid-in capital stock.

It seems to me that farm-loan bonds are just as good security as any other security that might be pledged or deposited as collateral with the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, that may be true; but there may also be a great many other varieties of bonds which are just as good as United States bonds. There are, however, plenty of United States bonds which may be obtained, and it seems to me unwise to enlarge in any way the character of security which shall be held as reserves. I object to the amendment. Farm-loan bonds are all right at present, and I hope they will continue to be; but, as there are plenty of United States bonds which may be used for this purpose, I do not see any need of the amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, one purpose of the amendment would be to increase somewhat the demand for farm-loan bonds and to broaden to some extent the market for such bonds. I would not propose the amendment if I did not feel that farm-loan bonds are absolutely safe. All we want to do is to make the system safe and sound, and I think farm-loan bonds are just as good security as the obligations of the Government.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President——

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Alabama will pardon me for a moment, the last issue of farm-loan bonds, of which, I think, there were something like $75,000,000, sold in half a day, and they sold above par. I do not believe that it would be very easy to secure such bonds. It might be possible for corporations established under the bill to get them, but they are sold to private parties as a high-class investment; and I see no necessity whatever for making them eligible under this bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, the amendment would enlarge the scope of the deposit; that is to say, as the bill would read without the amendment I propose it would be necessary to secure Government bonds to make the deposit. The amendment would simply allow the corporation, if it sees fit to do so, to utilize either farm-loan bonds or Government bonds, whichever might best suit the corporation.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, it seems to me that there is no more valid reason why we should permit Federal farm loan bonds as security for loans negotiated than that we should permit to be so used the bonds and stocks of great railroad corporations which are just as good security as farm loan bonds. As a matter of fact, we should never have permitted United States bonds to be used as collateral security by the Federal reserve system if at the time of the enactment of the Federal reserve act anybody could have conceived that the day would ever come when there would be $24,000,000,000 of United States bonds outstanding. What we had designed to do for 50 years theretofore, ineffectually, was to get away from a rigid bond-secured currency which was never responsive to the commercial needs of the country in times of exigency.

The distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] said yesterday that any security that was good was elastic. I differ from him on that proposition. In 1907, for example, United States bonds were good, but without going through the process of getting a national-bank charter and taking out circulation they were not good for currency and not a dollar of currency could be obtained on them. The Pennsylvania Railroad stocks and bonds were secure; they were good; but there is not a bank in the United States that could have obtained a dollar of currency on them, because such securities are not liquid collateral for loans.

Federal farm loan bonds are not Government securities; they are the evidence of indebtedness of private corporations; and if we ever once open the door for this type of security as a basis for currency and credit issues there is no telling where we will stop. As I said awhile ago, if we could ever have conceived that there would be $24,000,000,000 of United States bonds outstanding at one time, we would never have made United States bonds a basis for loans of a quick commercial nature; and in the final analysis that is what this bill provides, namely, loans of a commercial nature.

Senators undertake to differentiate commercial banking from investment banking, but their differentiation is not altogether clear. They undertake to differentiate commercial loans from farm loans, although 95 per cent of the business of agriculture is of a commercial nature; it is sale and barter; it is not investment. A great deal of it is speculation; but nobody as yet has been able to define the line between speculation and investment.

So I sincerely hope that the Senate will not decide to permit this entering wedge, because if once we accept the securities of private banking corporations or corporations of a private nature engaged in any activity as security for quick credits and issue of currency there is no telling where we will stop.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I am in favor of striking out this entire section down to line 10 of page 15, because I think it is unnecessary. I will not ask that, however, but I call attention to the provisions of this section.

None of these corporations can be permitted to do business until they shall deposit 25 per cent of their capital in United States bonds with the Federal reserve bank. This whole section—this whole bill, in fact—has been framed upon the basis and in the manner and after the form of the national bank act. You can take it from start to finish, and you will see that those who drafted it had before them the original national bank act, and they framed this law following that draft. The original national bank act provided for the deposit of United States bonds with the Comptroller of the Currency. A certain per cent of the capital of the bank had to be invested in United States bonds, and they had to be deposited here with the Treasury before the bank could do business.

The conditions to-day are altogether different from what they were in those times. When that act was framed it was important to find a market for United States bonds. That was done by giving the monopoly to the banks that were organized under the act to issue currency and circulating notes used as money against these bonds. The banks were "sweetened" in a way by the provision which enabled them to draw the interest on the bonds which they put up with the Treasury, and at the same time issue circulating notes against the bonds, pay no interest on the bonds, which were bank debts, and get interest from the loaning of that as money. That satisfied the banks. That, together with the other provision which taxed out of existence State banks, created a market for Government bonds.

We do not need that sort of thing to-day. Now, why require these corporations to put up with the Federal reserve bank 25 per cent of their capital in United States bonds before they can begin business, and allow them no benefit of credit whatever by reason of that investment of their capital in those bonds, and then follow that with another provision which requires that 7½ per cent of their total liabilities shall be thus invested in Government bonds deposited with the Treasury while they are doing business? In other words, under section 5 the capital must be 10 per cent of the total liabilities. Here you say that 7½ per cent of the total liabilities must be kept always invested in bonds deposited with the Federal reserve bank. That means to say that 75 per cent of the capital of these corporations shall be invested in bonds deposited with the Federal reserve bank if they do a maximum business. They must have 25 per cent of their capital on deposit before they can begin, and then, as they proceed, they must keep 7½ per cent of their liabilities always on hand, which means 75 per cent of their capital when they are doing a maximum business.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator understands that this reserve does not affect their loaning capacity at all. They can loan up to ten times their capital and surplus.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. McLEAN. It does not affect the loaning capacity of these institutions a particle.

Mr. FLETCHER. I realize that.

Mr. McLEAN. Does the Senator claim that they should not have any reserve?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am going to offer an amendment, to which I am leading up, providing that 20 per cent of their capital shall be invested in these bonds to enable them to begin business, and then reducing the 7½ per cent to 5 per cent so that when they are doing a maximum business not over 50 per cent of their entire capital shall be tied up in the bonds deposited with the Federal reserve bank.

Mr. McLEAN. But, Mr. President, it is not tied up, so far as their ability to do business is concerned. This reserve does not affect their ability to loan and discount. It makes no difference whatever with their ability to do business. It is merely a reserve requirement which they ought to have.

Mr. FLETCHER. They can not, it seems to me, compete with corporations organized under State and Federal charter which are not hampered in this way, requiring 75 per cent of their capital to be invested in bonds.

Mr. McLEAN. I shall be glad if the Senator will indicate to the Senate wherein they are hampered.

Mr. FLETCHER. They are hampered because they have 75 per cent of their capital tied up in bonds.

Mr. McLEAN. It is not tied up, it is merely deposited—put in safe-keeping.

Mr. FLETCHER. I know. They are getting 4½ per cent, we will say, or 4 per cent, on that amount of money. They are entitled to earn more than 4 per cent on their capital.

Mr. McLEAN. That is another proposition.

Mr. FLETCHER. Here you have 75 per cent of their capital on which they can not possibly earn over 4 per cent—the rate of interest paid on Government bonds.

Mr. McLEAN. If they loan ten times their capital they earn on that.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand that; but I submit that it is not necessary to require that these corporations shall keep on deposit with the Federal reserve bank 7½ per cent of their total liabilities, which may be ten times the amount of their capital.

Mr. McLEAN. I did not mean to say that they would earn 4 per cent on $2,500,000. I do not know what they would earn, but they would get their interest on their bonds wherever located, and the reserve deposit does not reduce their capital.

Mr. FLETCHER. Under the law as it stands the Federal reserve bank can issue circulating notes against Government bonds, so that when Government bonds are deposited there now by any bank they can get circulating notes on those bonds. This corporation will not be able under this bill to get any credits, any notes, or any benefits by reason of the deposit of Government bonds with the Federal reserve bank. It puts it in a different situation from other financial institutions.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, under the law one of these banks with $100,000 capital can lend $1,000,000. Do I understand that the Senator does not want any security held as a reserve upon that amount of loans—$1,000,000?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am willing, as I said, to have this reduction to 20 per cent to begin with of the capital of the banks invested in bonds and held as general collateral with the Federal reserve banks, and then to require them always to keep on hand 5 per cent of their total liabilities in bonds, but not 7½ per cent. That would be 50 per cent of its entire capital, if it is doing a maximum business, invested in United States bonds deposited with the Federal reserve bank.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not on the capital, I will say to the Senator, as I think he knows. Every time they make a loan over and above their capital there is a liability; and I simply say that if their capital was $100,000, they are authorized to make $1,000,000 of loans. Therefore $900,000 of those loans have to be made on what? Not on capital; that is out entirely; but there ought to be a reserve at least of 7½ per cent on the $900,000 that may be loaned, with the $100,000 capital, making $1,000,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the Senator believe that 5 per cent would not be ample protection?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that if I were running it myself, and had any responsibility at all as an officer of an institution, I would say that 7½ per cent was little enough. I would walk the floor many a night, even with 7½ per cent, if trouble came. Let us not make it less than 7½ per cent. It is not going to do the farmer any good at all, because he wants to be secure in whatever he undertakes, and I do not believe that the 5 per cent is ample.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator were doing business as a member bank and put up 7½ per cent of his liabilities in United States bonds, that might be all right where you could call on the Federal reserve bank to issue to you circulating notes.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; no more than the amount of bonds that you have.

Mr. FLETCHER. I know, to the amount of your bonds; and you get the benefit, therefore, of those circulating notes. This corporation gets no benefit of any credit or anything else by reason of its deposit of 7½ per cent of its total liabilities with the Federal reserve bank.

Mr. McLEAN. It sacrifices nothing.

Mr. SMOOT. It sacrifices nothing whatever.

Mr. McLEAN. They do not pay out cash over their counter. We want this reserve to meet losses, and it does not make any difference where it is; it might just as well be with the Federal reserve bank as in their own safe so far as their ability to do business is concerned.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know how they are able to put up United States bonds without having cash for it.

Mr. SMOOT. I should hate to see the Congress of the United States pass a law here as an example to the banks of the country that no security whatever should be held in order to pay losses.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not proposing that. I am proposing 5 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. This institution is not going to run without losses. It is impossible, and I think there is more chance for losses here, with the power behind the institution that is passing the law, than there is with men who put their money into an institution and watch out for the interests of that institution. So I am quite sure the Senator, if he will think it over very carefully—and he is a safe man, I know; he is not one of these fly-offs at all—will conclude that 7½ per cent is small enough. In fact, I would rather see it made 10 per cent.

Mr. GLASS. We have this rather singular situation. This bill is so peculiarly in the interest of the big live-stock people of the section of the country west of the Mississippi River that the Senator yesterday objected to its broad title as an agricultural credits bill, and he wanted to confine the title to the live-stock interests alone. It certainly is true that the bill was drawn in the interest of the live-stock business, and it was drawn in counsel and consultation with selected representatives of the great live-stock interests of the country. It is their bill, and they put this provision of security in the bill. They are perfectly content to put up this reserve as security, because they think and say that without it they can not conduct their business with facility, and can not engage the confidence of the moneyed interests of the country, to whom they have to look for the capital to assist in the organization of these corporations. It is their bill. They asked to be required to give this measure of security in the conduct of their business, and yet we hear objections to granting their request.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I imagine the live-stock interests were told about what they would have to have in this bill. It was drawn not so much by the live-stock people as by those connected with the Treasury Department as far as its officers are concerned, who want to make it absolutely safe. I have no objection to making it safe. My contention is that you are discriminating really against these corporations you are creating, because you are requiring that when they get to a maximum in the conduct of their business, 75 per cent of their capital shall be invested in these bonds, and the bonds deposited as collateral with the Federal reserve bank. They get no credits by way of discounts, they get no benefits by way of issuing circulating notes, like other institutions which have on deposit Government bonds. Therefore you are hampering them. You are not giving them that latitude which they ought to have if they are to serve these interests they are intended to serve.

Mr. GLASS. If I may interrupt the Senator, perhaps he was not present at the meeting of the committee at which it was stated that the bill was drafted by the attorney of the War Finance Corporation, under the advice of the Director of the War Finance Corporation, Mr. Eugene Meyer, who has made not one but half a dozen trips through that whole territory, and it was through his personal efforts that at least 100 of these live-stock corporations were organized, and secured hundreds of millions of dollars of loans from the War Finance Corporation. So the bill was drafted in that way by these people to meet an emergency which the experience of the War Finance Corporation enabled them to meet. I have understood that it was entirely satisfactory to the representatives of the great interests out there which it is assumed to benefit.

Mr. FLETCHER. I recall the statement with regard to the origin of the bill. Of course, we are now providing a permanent system, or attempting to do so, and I am in hopes it will operate so as to be of some real and actual benefit. I am not going to continue the discussion further. I move in line 23, page 13, to strike out "25" and to insert "20." They are required to put up 20 per cent of their capital before they have a single liability.

Mr. McLEAN. If the Senator can point to a single disadvantage to the corporation which will result by reason of the deposit of 25 per cent, I will agree to his amendment, if he can point to a single disadvantage in the conduct of their business.

Mr. FLETCHER. Tying up from 20 to 75 per cent of their capital amounts to a reduction of the capital of these corporations.

Mr. McLEAN. I think the Senator is mistaken about that. Their capital would not be impaired.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the national banks, under the original act, had been required to put up 75 per cent of their capital in Government bonds the system would not have functioned at all, unless that had been followed with the privilege of obtaining notes on those bonds.

Mr. McLEAN. It does not require that these bonds shall be the bonds that carry the circulating privilege.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; it does not.

Mr. McLEAN. Consequently, there is absolutely no disadvantage.

Mr. FLETCHER. And they get no benefits whatever from that investment of their capital. In the case of the national banks, it would have been a reduction of their capital, if it had not been that as against that they were allowed the privilege of issuing circulating notes. But, as I said, I make the motion that the change be made and just submit it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FLETCHER. On page 14, line 2, I move to strike out "7½" and to insert in lieu thereof "5," so that there shall always be on deposit in the Federal reserve bank bonds to the amount of 5 per cent of the liabilities of these corporations, instead of 7½ per cent. That would mean 50 per cent of their total capital, if they were doing a maximum business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FLETCHER. On page 19, I suggest an amendment in line 5, to strike out the word "companies" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "corporations." That is simply a verbal change. We have been referring to corporations all along, and I move to change the word "companies" to "corporations."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. I also suggest the correction of the spelling of the word "assets" in the same line.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. To strike out the unnecessary "s" in the word "assets."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am a little inclined to think that the provision for a minimum fee of $50 for each examination is high; but I am not going to press that very far. It seems to me that in the case of many of these corporations an examiner could make the entire examination in one day, particularly in the case of smaller corporations, and I think a minimum fee of $50 is pretty high for that. I merely suggest that to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. McLEAN. I have had no personal experience in examining these corporations or banks.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, there would be nothing like the trouble experienced in examining a bank.

Mr. McLEAN. I fancy that if the examinations are to be thorough enough to be of any benefit, it would cost at least $50. I do not think we had better change that.

Mr. SMOOT. The examination of this paper is quite different from the examination of a bank where they hold bonds as collateral and can hand the bonds out. In many cases they would have to go and examine the stock which is collateral for the loan, the dairy herd, for instance. I think there would be very few of them that could be made for the minimum. Perhaps the examiner would have to travel hundreds of miles and go and see the stock.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know how that will work eventually. It occurred to me that the business of some of these corporations would not be very complicated, particularly for a while, anyhow, and that fixing the minimum fee at $50 would be a little out of reason. But we can tell when it gets into operation whether it is too high or not, and we will let it stand as it is.

Mr. McLEAN. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that having amended line 5, page 19, by inserting the word "corporations" instead of the word "companies" it will be necessary to amend lines 6 and 7 on the same page, where the word "companies" appears, by inserting the word "corporations."

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; I think so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 19, line 6, to strike out the word "companies" and insert the word "corporations," and in line 7 to make the same amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it would make it clearer, if I may suggest to the chairman of the committee, if in line 22, page 19, after the word "held," we insert the words "by said comptroller." Of course, it is understood that the comptroller will hold these securities. It will be clearer if we insert the words "by said comptroller" after the word "held," in line 22, so that we will know precisely what officer is to make the decision. They are to make reports to the comptroller, and he is the one to know whether they conform to the law.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not object to that.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it would be clearer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 19, line 22, after the word "held," to insert the words "by said comptroller."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. On page 21, I think the word "national," in line 12, should be changed to "member," because there are some of these banks which are not national banks, and yet they are members of the Federal reserve system.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not see any objection to that.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move to strike out the word "national," in line 12, and to insert the word "member."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In the subheading on page 21, line 12, to strike out the word "national," before the word "banks," and to insert the word "member."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not understand that. This is a subhead, and this follows: "That any national banking association may file application with the Comptroller of the Currency for permission to invest," and so on.

Mr. FLETCHER. Why should not any member bank of the Federal reserve system do that? My idea is to make it available to the member banks of the system, and I was going to move to insert, on line 13, after the word "any," the words "member bank of the Federal reserve system," so that it will read, "any member bank of the Federal reserve system may file application."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then the title should be changed from "national banks" to "banks members of the Federal reserve system."

Mr. FLETCHER. I have just proposed that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But it will not do to say "member banks may become," and so on. That would not signify anything.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is the general term used in the law everywhere referring to banks which are members of the Federal reserve system.

Mr. McLEAN. If we make it clear in the text of section 12 that they shall be member banks of the Federal reserve system, it seems to me that will cover it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It does not signify anything to say "member banks" in this bill. Of course, the phrase "member banks" in the bill creating the Federal reserve system was all right, because it referred continually to banks which were members of the system.

Mr. FLETCHER. We have already changed "national" to "member." I am moving to insert "member banks of the Federal reserve system." That would make it clear.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 21, line 12, after the word "banks," insert the words "members of the Federal reserve system."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. In line 13, page 21, after the word "any," I move to insert the words "member banks of the Federal reserve system" and to strike out the words "national banking association."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 21, line 13, strike out the words "national banking association" and in lieu thereof insert "member banks of the Federal reserve system."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. In line 17, on the same page, after the word "organized," I move to insert the words "or doing business," so as to take care of corporations already existing.

Mr. McLEAN. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. In line 12 on page 22 the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] calls my attention to the use of the words "Federal agricultural credit" in the corporate title. We have made the same change there, have we not?

Mr. McLEAN. No; not to interfere with that.

Mr. FLETCHER. In line 22 we have given the name of the corporations, to be known as Federal live-stock and agricultural loan corporations.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; but that is the title.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is the name of the corporation.

Mr. McLEAN. No; that is the title. The corporations remain the same as provided in the law, agricultural credit corporations. We have not changed that.

Mr. FLETCHER. Do I understand the chairman to say that "rural credit corporations" is proper as a subhead in line 22, page 22? The subhead reads, "Rural credit corporations."

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator is right.

Mr. FLETCHER. That ought to be changed to conform to the name we gave them.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; Federal agricultural corporations.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move to strike out the word "rural," on page 22, line 22, and insert the words "Federal agricultural."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In the subhead on page 22, line 22, before the word "credit," strike out the word "rural" and insert the words "Federal agricultural."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to call attention of the Senator from Connecticut to the language in line 2, page 23, "to entitle it to become a Federal agricultural credit corporation under the provisions of this act." Will not that have to be changed?

Mr. McLEAN. No; I do not think so. The amendment adopted by the Senate affected the title only. The corporations formed under the act are to be denominated "Federal agricultural credit corporations."

Mr. FLETCHER. I call the Senator's attention to the provision we had inserted yesterday:

SEC. 2. That corporations for the purpose of providing credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States, to be known as Federal live stock and agricultural loan corporations, may be formed—

And so forth. We gave the name there.

Mr. SIMMONS. It ought to be changed all the way through the bill. It was so agreed yesterday in connection with that amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think we will have to conform to that amendment. That is the name we gave them. The bill itself did not specify the name but the amendment I offered did specify it.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. An amendment was agreed to on that page which makes the section read as follows:

That corporations for the purpose of providing credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States, to be known as Federal live stock and agricultural loan corporations, may be formed—

And so forth.

Mr. FLETCHER. In line 23 we have not attempted to give the name of the corporation, but simply said that it shall include the words "Federal agricultural credit." I think we will have to eliminate the word "credit" to conform to the name which we have given in line 1. It simply says it shall include the words "Federal agricultural credit." The name we have given does not include the word "credit." It includes the words "Federal agricultural." We could modify line 23 so as to provide that it shall include the words "Federal agricultural."

Mr. McLEAN. My recollection is correct. With regard to the title of the corporations in line 23, we did not amend that. Therefore it is unimportant.

Mr. FLETCHER. But the bill now specifies the name we shall give them.

Mr. McLEAN. I think it is unimportant, but I do not object to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Florida state the amendment?

Mr. FLETCHER. In the subhead, on page 22, line 22, I move to strike out "rural" and insert the words "Federal agricultural," so it will read "conversion of State financing corporations into Federal agricultural corporations."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me suggest to the Senator from Florida that he had better correct the language in lines 22 and 23 on page 2, while the subject is under consideration, to conform to the language inserted at the top of the page.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, line 23, strike out "Federal agricultural credit" and insert in lieu thereof "Federal live-stock and agricultural loan corporations."

Mr. McLEAN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. FLETCHER. The amendment I have proposed includes the words "live stock and agricultural" and to conform to the action of the Senate in reference to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] it includes both. It is known as a Federal live-stock and agricultural loan corporation. That is the name given in the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota, and I think we ought to have the subheads conform to that.

Mr. McLEAN. I have no objection.

Mr. FLETCHER. That ought to read "Federal live-stock and agricultural loan corporation."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote by which the other amendment to the subheading was agreed to will be reconsidered and the amendment now proposed will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 22, line 22, strike out "rural credit" and insert in lieu the words "Federal live-stock and agricultural loan," so it will read:

Conversion of State financing corporations into Federal live-stock and agricultural loan corporations.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. May I suggest that the phrase "Federal agricultural credit" occurs in other places throughout the bill. I ask unanimous consent that wherever the phrase "Federal agricultural credit" occurs in the bill it be modified in accordance with the phrase which has just been adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FLETCHER. I offer another amendment. At the end of section 401, page 41, line 7, I move to strike out the period, insert a colon, and the following:

Provided, That no loan in excess of $10,000 shall be made by any Federal land bank to any one borrower unless such bank shall at the time of closing such loan have funds on hand and available for lending sufficient to meet all applications pending in said bank, qualified under the provisions of this act, for loans not exceeding $10,000.

The object of that is to be certain that the man of moderate means, the small farmer, if you please, will be accommodated first under the farm-loan system. Of course, at present the farm-loan bonds find a ready market and are absorbed within a few hours, practically whatever the Farm Loan Board offers, but we know there has been a time when at least the Farm Loan Board reported to us that it was a question whether the public would absorb the bonds as fast as the money was needed or any faster than they were offering them. It will be recalled that back in 1921 there was a general complaint all over the country that the farmers had applications pending for months and months, some of them where the appraisals had been made and approved and the applications approved, and they could not get the money.

Of course, all the money the Farm Loan Board has and that the Federal land bank can get arises from the proceeds of the farm-loan bonds, and unless the bonds are offered there can be of course no sales and no proceeds, and therefore no funds to accommodate applying borrowers. That situation continued for some months. I never had any confidence in the claim that the public would not take the bonds, but there was some apprehension that they would not, and of course the Farm Loan Board could not afford to see the bonds put on the market and no offering be made at par or above. They could not afford to have them sold below par, and therefore they did not offer the bonds. I never could find any quite reasonable explanation of that idea at all, but, assuming and believing that the Farm Loan Board was acting in good faith under those conditions, I reached the conclusion in my own mind that they were getting their information from the bond syndicates; that the bond syndicates were offering foreign securities and other securities in this country upon which they were getting from 5 to 10 per cent commission, and they therefore did not want the farm-loan bonds offered, on which they would only receive a commission of 1 per cent.

Therefore they wanted the market for themselves and advised the Farm Loan Board that the public would not take the farm-loan bonds readily if they were offered. I merely surmised that that was about the situation. At any rate, the Farm Loan Board did not offer the bonds in sufficient quantities to meet the needs of the farmer, and there was great delay and a lack of money. They said, as I have stated, that the public demands would not justify their offering the bonds, and that the public would not absorb them if they did offer them, or, at least, that they apprehended that would be the case. We may again come to that situation when the debentures to be offered under the Lenroot bill, which we shall consider next, I believe, and the debentures to be offered under the pending measure go on the market. It may be that the public will not absorb these farm-loan bonds as readily as heretofore, and the board may find itself short of funds to meet current needs.

My amendment is to the effect that the Farm Loan Board must not make loans of $25,000 or exceeding $10,000 until the people who want loans of $10,000 and less are supplied. That is all the amendment provides. If there are ample funds, there is no limitations; but if the funds are not sufficient to supply all applicants the needs of the small borrowers, the tenants who want to acquire homes, who are in a position to acquire homes and who will not want more than three thousand or four thousand dollars in any case, ought first to be supplied. When they are supplied, then the board may reach out for larger loans and larger amounts. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. KING. I desire to ask the Senator from Florida a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. KING. I wish to ask the Senator from Florida, in view of the appeal which he has just made, as I understand his remarks in behalf of the small farmer who desires to be a borrower, if he perceives in this bill any relief whatever to the small agriculturist? I have tried to read into the language of the bill an interpretation from which it might be inferred that the small farmer or even the agriculturist of large means might get some benefit; but, as I understand the bill, it seems to me that it will aid, if it aids anybody, merely the live-stock man. If that be true, why this earnest appeal by the Senator from Florida in behalf of the marketing of securities which may be issued under this bill in behalf of the small agriculturist?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator's inquiry, I desire to say that I think unquestionably the benefits arising from this bill will accrue largely to the live-stock growers, particularly those who conduct the business on a very considerable scale. There are, however, some possibilities of benefit in certain provisions of the bill to those who are engaged in agriculture; but the matter under discussion arises in connection with section 401 of the bill, which proposes to amend the Federal farm loan act and provides that the present law, which limits the amount which any one borrower may obtain to $10,000, shall be changed so that he may obtain $25,000. I am simply proposing a limitation to the effect that the Farm Loan Board shall not raise the present limit and make loans exceeding $10,000 to any one borrower unless the board has funds available with which to take care of the smaller borrowers. It comes in connection with the provisions of the bill, and that is why it is pertinent here.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Florida a question at this point?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. PITTMAN. I wish to know if the Senator from Florida does not fear that his amendment will simply act as an obstruction to loans over $10,000. The amendment reads:

Provided, That no loan in excess of $10,000 shall be made by any Federal land bank to any one borrower, unless such bank shall, at the time of closing such loan, have funds on hand and available for lending sufficient to meet all applications pending in said bank, qualified under the provisions of this act, for loans not exceeding $10,000.

There might be sufficient funds on hand to make loans of over $10,000, taking into consideration the applications for smaller loans which the board were going to grant; in other words, there is no limitation whatever on the amount which may be applied for, but it is hardly probable that all applications are going to be granted. The restriction proposed in the amendment is not based upon the obligations of the bank but upon the applications to the bank.

Mr. FLETCHER. But I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the applications must, first, be pending in the bank, and, second, they must be qualified under the provisions of the proposed act; that is to say, the applications must have been passed upon and approved. I am willing to make that perfectly plain and, if the Senator prefers, to use the words "approved loans"; in other words, the applications must be in a state to be closed, if the board have the funds to close them, and they must be passed upon and approved. That is what I mean when I use the words "qualified under this act"; that the loans shall have proceeded through all the stages until they are ready to be closed.

Mr. PITTMAN. I did not understand the phrase "qualified under the provisions of this act" to mean any more than that the applicants were qualified to receive loans if their applications were approved. If the Senator means that the loans that have been approved shall be paid before subsequent loans in excess of $10,000 may be approved, I would not have any objection to it in that form.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I was going to suggest that the words "approved applications" might remove the objection. I am afraid in its present form the meaning of the amendment is very uncertain, and if the Senator does not object I should like to have him accept the amendment to his amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well; I will insert the word "approved" before the word "applications," so as to read:

to meet all approved applications pending in said bank, qualified under the provisions of this act.

I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida as modified.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator from Florida that the language in his proposed amendment is so drastic as practically to tie up the operations of the Federal land banks. A provision such as I am about to read would direct the policy without making such a questionable and excessive limitation:

Provided, That whenever a lack of available funds shall limit or delay the making of loans the Federal farm loan banks shall give preference to loans not in excess of $10,000.

I think the Senator from Nevada was about to make some such suggestion. It seems to me the language of the amendment of the Senator from Florida might indicate that the banks could not be permitted to make larger loans if the number of applications pending would exceed the available funds of the bank at that time. I know the Senator uses the word "qualified" in his amendment, but I doubt whether that would be a fact easily ascertained.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Florida has inserted the word "approved" in his amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then I will inquire how the amendment now reads?

Mr. FLETCHER. The amendment reads:

Provided, That no loan in excess of $10,000 shall be made by any Federal land bank to any one borrower, unless such bank shall, at the time of closing such loan, have funds on hand and available for lending sufficient to meet all approved applications pending in said bank, qualified under the provisions of this act, for loans not exceeding $10,000.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that probably cures the difficulty in another way; but I think the language I have suggested states the policy which undoubtedly will be pursued under the regulations of the Farm Loan Board. I think, though, that the amendment of the Senator from Florida will answer the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida as modified.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida knows that I have been rather slow to consent to any increase above $10,000 in the limit of loans which may be made by the Federal land banks. I have held that position because I remember that when the farm loan act was framed its purpose was to accommodate the farmer who possibly wanted to buy a small farm and who had not much capital, and it was thought that a loan of $10,000 was as far as the Government ought to go. I remember distinctly that Senator Gronna, who was at that time deeply interested in the operation of the act, was very much opposed to any increase above $10,000, and that at that time the directors of banks throughout the country were opposed to it for the reason that they felt, so far as the Federal farm-loan banks were concerned, that the limit of $10,000 should be retained to assist the small farmer, for fear if the limit were increased in a period of depression men with capital might take advantage of the situation and purchase mortgages or purchase farms that were mortgaged and foreclose, and in that way deprive many small farmers of their property and drive them to increase tenant farming. So we believed that with the joint-stock land banks, which could loan up to $50,000, the field would be wisely and fully covered. That was my view then, but a majority of the members of the committee felt the time had come when we could safely increase the limit to $25,000, and I have no objection.

While the members of the Federal Farm Loan Board do not feel like volunteering their opinions on matters of policy, I think it is safe to say that they would much prefer that it be left to their discretion. The Senate will remember that the committee considered this amendment very carefully and felt that under all the circumstances it was better and wiser to leave the section as originally drawn, because there might be an application for a loan of $10,500 or $11,000 that was exceedingly meritorious and that ought to be granted. So we believed that we could safely leave it to the discretion of the Federal Farm Loan Board and the directors of the banks. That was the feeling of the committee. Personally, I have no special objection to the amendment, but I think it wiser that it should be left to the discretion of the Farm Loan Board. I do not think it will be abused, and I think they will follow the custom that they have followed in the past of giving preference to the small loans.

The record shows, I think, that the average loan is only about $3,000, and I have no fear of the administration of the law if it is left to the discretion of the board. As the Senator from Nebraska has hinted, if the amendment should be adopted it might possibly indicate that it was the opinion of Congress that these loans ought not to be extended in any event where the amount was above $10,000 unless the loan was very pressing; and there might be an instance, as I have said, where a loan of eleven or twelve thousand dollars might be just as meritorious as a loan of $3,000 and one that ought to be granted.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, that would be a very unfortunate situation, and I want it distinctly understood that that is not the construction that the committee puts on it. Is that true? The committee does not place the construction on the amendment that the Senator from Florida has offered that it would be in the nature of an intimation to the banks that we did not generally favor loans of over $10,000.

Mr. McLEAN. Of course, the board would have to construe the law according to its terms. I do not know what construction they would put upon it; but we felt that it was better to leave it to their discretion, for the reasons I have stated.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does the Senator from Florida desire by his amendment to intimate to the banks that it is the sentiment of the Senate that we do not in general approve of loans of over $10,000 unless a great emergency exists?

Mr. FLETCHER. Not at all; but the bill itself provides that loans up to $25,000 are expressly authorized to any one borrower. I am simply proposing that that policy shall be pursued and that law shall go into effect, that we do authorize them to make such loans, but the limitation is that the people from $10,000 down must first be taken care of. That is to say, if the funds are ample to take care of those desiring loans of $10,000 or less, then, of course, the law authorizing loans up to $25,000 shall be observed.

Mr. PITTMAN. If the funds are ample, they will all be taken care of.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think so. I do not think there will be any trouble about it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then, why the amendment?

Mr. FLETCHER. But we never can tell what may happen hereafter. This is only a contingency. At present all these current needs are amply provided for. They have ample funds, and there is no trouble about making loans. The law proposed by this bill is to authorize loans up to $25,000. That is a change in the present law. The present law limits to $10,000 the amount that may be loaned to any one borrower. Now, we say that the limitation shall be $25,000; and I am simply providing that only in case funds are not available to take care of the loans of $10,000 or less shall there be any question about their making the loans above $10,000.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am going to vote for the Senator's amendment, because I do not think it carries with it any such intimation as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] stated might be considered by the bank. I think it is the plain intention of the committee to increase the amount that they may lend, and that a qualified borrower showing good cause for a loan of $25,000 shall have just as good a standing before the bank and just as much consideration as one borrowing less than $10,000; that there shall be no discrimination or distinction at all with regard to the amount. As a matter of fact, I think the amendment might apply to all loans, that they should not pay any loan so long as an approved application was pending for others ahead of it; but I have no objection to the amendment under those conditions.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the movement to secure this change in the law, and increase from $10,000 to $25,000 the amount which may be lent in each case by the farm loan banks, came from the farmers of the country. It did not originate with Senators or with the committee. It has been for some time one of the most insistent demands that the farmers of the United States have been making with respect to the operations of these banks.

I assume that the farmers of the country, in insisting upon this increase in the amount that may be lent to one person, did so because they thought it was exceedingly important that these larger loans should be made, possibly as important in many instances that these larger loans should be made as that the smaller loans should be made; and I think any restriction or any limitation as to these loans, giving a preference to one class as against the other, probably would defeat one of the purposes of those who have asked for the legislation.

Personally, I believe as a rule that the smaller amounts should be preferred. I think that should be the general policy of the board. I think it will be the general policy of the board. I should not like, however, to see any provision adopted which would indicate to the board that the Congress, in the passage of the law, intended that they should put aside the applications for the larger amounts until they had accommodated those asking for the smaller amounts, because if that were done I am thoroughly convinced that there are many instances in which farmers who are confronted with a mortgage upon their property to be foreclosed unless they borrow a sum more than $10,000 would be put at a very great disadvantage, and that they are as much entitled to the benefit of this act as the farmer whose property is mortgaged for less than $10,000 and who is threatened with foreclosure proceedings.

Mr. President, in the circumstances I think it is very much better to leave this whole matter, just as the bill as now drawn leaves it, in the discretion of the board. The members of the board will exercise that discretion wisely, I am sure; and where a preference should be given to the smaller loan as against the larger loan applied for, I have no doubt they will give it.

I trust that the amendment will not be adopted. I do not think it is a good amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry? Has he any information as to the applications which have been made for loans in excess of $10,000, or any information as to whether or not there would be any considerable number of them?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think any applications have been made for loans in excess of $10,000, because the present law expressly limits to that amount the power of the board to loan.

Mr. KING. Yes; I did not speak accurately. Has the Senator any information as to whether or not there has been any considerable demand for loans in excess of $10,000, and has he any information that would foreshadow that loans of that character might deplete the fund which was available for the smaller debtor, so that the smaller debtor might be denied the opportunity of getting loans?

Mr. SIMMONS. All I can say to the Senator about that is that I have heard a good many farmers say that the act was of no value to them because $10,000 would not relieve them; it would be necessary for them to have a larger amount to get any relief at all. I do know, further, that the bank in the district in which I live, the Federal Land Bank of Columbia, about a year ago was so flooded with applications for loans under the old law, the law as it now is, that they issued a circular stating that it would be six months before they would be able to examine the applications and, even if they had the funds, get ready to accommodate those who were entitled to accommodation. At the end of six months a further notice was given that it would be possibly three months before they would be in a position to accept new applications at all. I think in that case it would be quite a long time—I am speaking now only of that bank, which serves four States, however, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida—if they had to give preference to applications for loans under $10,000, it would be quite a long time before they ever would be able to give consideration to the applications for loans above $10,000.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think the Senator is in error in regard to the language of the amendment. It does not say that they shall give attention to loans of $10,000 first.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will change that to "making the loans."

Mr. PITTMAN. It says that they shall pay the loans, not to which attention has already been given but which have been approved and are simply waiting for payment. I think it is very fair to pay them in the order of approval.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to paying them in the order of approval, but what I insist is that nothing shall be written in the law that would say to the board, "You must prefer one class of loans and you must hold another class in abeyance until you have accommodated the preferred class."

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Utah that within the last 30 days I have received resolutions and letters from more than 40 local farm-loan associations in Kansas urging this amendment extending the loan limit to $25,000. As the Senator from North Carolina says, the demand does come from the farmers themselves; and I think all the national farm organizations have gone on record in the last few months as believing that this amendment to the farm-loan act is very necessary.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me ask the Senator a question. These farmers would not have asked for this increase unless they thought it was very important that these larger loans should be made, would they?

Mr. CAPPER. The Senator is entirely right.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, my first criticism of the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida was that it was too rigid; that it tied up the operations of the banks to too great an extent; but by his acceptance of the word "approved," his amendment practically loses all its controlling force, in my opinion. All the bank directors have to do is to delay the approval of small loans, and they can give preference to large loans; so that the injection of that word "approved" has taken his amendment out of the class of rigid amendments, too rigid to be desirable, and put it into a class where it seems to me it is almost inoperative. This leads me to renew the suggestion that the wise course is to lay down the policy that preference shall be given to loans not exceeding $10,000 whenever there is a shortage of funds; that is to say, whenever the funds at hand are not adequate to make all loans, and some loans have to be delayed and some loans have to suffer, you shall make the delay affect the big loans instead of the little ones.

Mr. President, it was the purpose of the law, undoubtedly, to provide loans of a comparatively small amount; and in drafting the law, as I well remember, we limited the amount of the farm-loan bank loans proper to $10,000, but we gave to the joint-stock banks a larger limitation, with the idea that they would take care of the big loans; that when a man wanted to borrow so much money, say $25,000, he had facilities, he had opportunities, which are not open to the small farmer. So the original intention undoubtedly was to confine these mutual banks to the small loans and open to them an exclusive field for procuring loans on desirable terms. I believe the farmers are justified in their demand that where the funds are abundant the restriction on the Federal farm-loan banks ought to be withdrawn and they ought to be allowed to compete with the joint-stock banks in making the larger loans.

So I suggest to the Senator from Florida that this proposition of mine will more nearly carry out that purpose—that whenever a lack of available funds shall limit or delay the making of loans the Federal farm-loan banks shall give preference to loans not in excess of $10,000. I think the amendment, in the form in which the Senator has it now, after he has injected the word "approved" into it, leaves the matter wholly within the power of the banks, and there is no preference given to the small loans whatever.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I am inclined to think that the proposal of the Senator from Nebraska would meet the situation. I think he properly interprets my intention, and I understand his to be in accord with mine, namely, that we agree this system was originally established for the purpose of providing accommodation for those who could not get accommodations anywhere else really. We know perfectly well that under the old national bank law national banks were prohibited from making loans on real estate. The chief asset of the farmer was stricken down under the only financial system we had until we established this farm-loan system, and we organized this system to take care of those people who were unable to get accommodations through the commercial system we had or through any other means.

We wanted primarily to enable every man in this country to own his own home, and to do that we had to provide a plan for giving him financial accommodation that he could meet, and upon terms, rates of interest, and all that sort of thing, that he could bear, and we devised this system. It has worked admirably. Seven hundred million dollars have been found for the farmers of this country under this system, at 5½ per cent, with the right to pay off 1 per cent per annum on the principal, and practically on their own terms. It is working admirably, it is accomplishing great results, and, as the Senator from Connecticut mentioned a moment ago, in which statement I think he is entirely correct, the average loans up to this time have been something like $3,000.

At present there are ample funds to take care of the needs of agriculture, whether the limitation is raised or not. There may come a time when those funds would not be adequate to take care of larger loans, and we had that in view when we framed the act, as the Senator from Nebraska has mentioned, and for that reason we established the joint-stock land banks, to function so that those engaged in agriculture on a larger scale, who might require much more capital than the ordinary farmer would require or need, could be accommodated. Therefore we permitted the joint-stock land banks to be covered into the system. They have been covering the field of loans from $10,000 up. They are not limited to $10,000, and I am told they are now making loans of two or three thousand dollars. They were supposed to provide for accommodations in excess of $10,000. They are not obliged under the law, I think, to confine their loans to that amount, because, as I have said, I think they are making loans now in the field which has always been occupied by the Federal land banks.

That is another reason why I am not opposing the raising of this limit from $10,000 to $25,000. I think there has been quite a general demand over the country for this increase in that limitation, because farm values have increased, and where five or six years ago a man might be amply supplied with $10,000, he would probably need twice that to-day to accomplish the same purpose.

Mr. McLEAN. If the Senator will permit an interruption there, I am not opposing this increase in the limitation to $25,000, but when we increase it, I want it done in a way that will confer every benefit possible on the farmers of the country. I think the Senator loses sight of the point I made, and which the Senator from North Carolina reinforced, that there might be a farmer who has a mortgage to-day of $10,000 on his farm. Funds may be short. There may be two or three or more loans of smaller amounts which have been qualified and approved; yet they may not be very pressing, while this mortgage of $10,000 may be threatened with foreclosure, and unless the borrower can raise, perhaps, $5,000, or a few thousand dollars more, he may lose his farm. It seemed to the committee that it was wise to leave such matters to the discretion of the Farm Loan Board.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, after all, is it not a matter of administration?

Mr. McLEAN. It seems to me so.

Mr. GLASS. If we increase the limit to $25,000, is it not to be presumed that no well-conducted farm loan bank is going to make a loan of $25,000, if it has applications for half a dozen loans of from two to five or ten thousand dollars? If we extend the limitation to $25,000, nothing we can put in the law will affect the matter, because it is a matter of administration and of banking judgment in the last analysis.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; and it should be administered in a way that will confer the greatest possible benefit to the farmer.

Mr. GLASS. As a matter of fact, we know, Mr. President, that members of the Federal Farm Loan Board have come before our committee time and time again and stated, both orally and in writing, that they are opposed to the policy of making $25,000 loans when they have not sufficient funds to make the lesser loans. So, as I have said, in the last analysis, it is simply a question of administration, and it seems to me all we should do here, if that is the judgment of the Senate, would be to extend the limitation.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, it was my intention to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Florida, because I did not think it created any discrimination; I thought it was simply a fair amendment providing that the banks should pay in the order of approval. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska would have an entirely different effect. The Senator from Florida has expressed a willingness to accept the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, or, rather, he approved it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have not accepted it. I want a vote on mine first.

Mr. PITTMAN. The committee which had charge of this bill gave it most careful and long consideration. In addition to the committee, a number of Senators who were interested in this matter had an opportunity and the pleasure of listening to the representatives of various farm organizations discuss this bill. They have approved this paragraph as it is written after long and careful consideration. It is a very dangerous thing to attempt to change those provisions on the floor of the Senate where there is any doubt as to the effect of the change. There is doubt as to the effect of this, because the Senator in his original amendment had one view of its construction, and upon suggestion that it might have another, he changed it. Now, the Senator from Nebraska says that the Senator's amendment, as amended and approved, does not have the meaning the Senator from Florida thinks it has, and he offers another.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am not offering any amendment. The fact is, I am willing to accept this as it stands, but it seemed to me that if anything were inserted, it should be a mere directory expression of the principle to be followed rather than a rigid and restrictive amendment such as the Senator from Florida proposes. I am not proposing any amendment.

I wanted to explain why I have changed my mind, and will vote for the committee amendment. I see the difficulty of trying to amend this matter on the floor, and get the meaning each Senator has in mind. It has been approved by the committee after long consideration, and it was approved by all the representatives of those directly interested in it.

I want to give one other reason for the raising of this limitation to $25,000. The loans in farming communities are generally by banks whose capital hardly ever exceeds $100,000. They are limited in their lending to $10,000. If a stock raiser meets an emergency, when he is about to suffer a great loss for the need for fifteen or twenty thousand dollars immediately, and there is no bank in his community with the legal authority to lend over $10,000, he suffers a loss. We all know that. It is the case in nearly all of the farming communities that the little banks which serve the farmers have small capital, and they are limited to lending 10 per cent of their capital to any one person. Some of the banks have entered into frauds to cover that, but it is not approved and it is a dangerous practice. For that reason it became necessary, if we are going to protect farmers against loss in an emergency, when they could not borrow money, to increase the limitation to $25,000. For instance, in Idaho bank after bank failed because they had loaned out a tremendous amount of money, in excess of what they should have loaned, in excess of the 10 per cent of their capital. They had to do that to carry these industries along, and they failed. The farm banks could not lend over $10,000, and they could not come and aid these people where they required twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars. It seems to me that is a very dangerous proposition.

Mr. McLEAN. Should we not leave with the board the discretion as to which emergency is entitled to precedence? A loan for $12,000 may be more deserving than any other loan that is approved, and yet unless the amendment still leaves with the board the discretion to qualify that loan in preference to the small loan, the man may lose his farm. If we are going to amend the law and give the farmers the benefit of it, I want to do it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, ordinarily the farmer who wants more than $10,000 is not only able to resort to the joint-stock land banks but is able to resort to banks and other financial institutions and money lenders generally. He has a situation that is entirely different from the little man who is unable to get any accommodation anywhere except under this system.

Now, we have pretty well all agreed—the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and all—that speaking generally the applicants for small loans should be accommodated first. If that is true, why not say so? Why leave it to a board to say so? It may be that the present Farm Loan Board, in thorough sympathy with the act and its purpose, will carry out what we are hoping and believing they will carry out. But that board is a politically appointed board and its personnel may change any time. Why not put in the law just what we say the purpose of the law and the intention of Congress is?

Mr. GLASS. Because the board and not the Congress of the United States is in constant contact with all of these problems and very much better supplied with information for the guidance of their judgment than the Senate could possibly be. That is the policy which has thus far been pursued by the board. The board has time and again indicated that that would continue to be their policy, unless circumstances should arise which would alter their judgment. It seems to me that the matter is one of administration and not of legislation, and that we should leave it in the judgment of the board.

Mr. FLETCHER. The board at one time was opposed to any increase. They so stated, but at last said they would not oppose it. They do not particularly favor it, but they believe there is a demand for it from the farmers and farm organizations of the country, and they are willing that the increase should be made. I have no doubt they have in their minds the intention of taking care of the loans which are applied for up to the limit of $25,000, if they have the funds, but if the funds are limited they are going to take care of the smaller loans first. I believe they intend to do that, and all I expect to accomplish by the amendment is to authorize them to do it, so that when an application is made for $25,000 they can well say under the law, "You will have to wait because we have not adequate funds to accommodate you."

Mr. McLEAN. But, if the Senator will pardon me, suppose that a loan for $12,000 should have preference under all the circumstances? Among all the loans that are qualified and approved there may be one for $12,000 which is more pressing and is clearly entitled to preference. Why limit the discretion of the board?

Mr. FLETCHER. Oh, no; but until they have funds enough to meet them. They do not have actually to meet them. I do not think that sort of case will arise. The board will know how much each bank will have and will know what the approved applications are when this very precious loan of $12,000 is applied for. They will know whether they have adequate funds to meet the situation and, of course, they will not hesitate a minute if they have the funds.

It is not altogether true that every farmer in the country or every farm organization is indorsing the proposed increase. I am not opposing it. I am willing to concede that a majority of the people interested in the system are in favor of the increase. I am in favor of it. I am simply trying in a provision here to protect the little fellow who can not get his accommodation anywhere else but through this system. I want to see him safe before we go to take care of the people who have a medium elsewhere, namely, the joint stock land bank, to apply to for accommodation.

Here is a letter from Washington, Va., from a national farm-loan association, dated January 15, 1923, in which it is said:

> I am also inclined to think that the limit of the loan to any one person should not exceed $10,000, for there are very few farmers in my section who ought to owe more than $10,000. However, in other sections this may be different, but I believe with rare exceptions.

Here is another letter from another association:

> So far as this association is concerned, loans of $10,000 are big enough, and I believe if the farm-loan banks assist the small farmers they will be doing more good than by making the large loans of over $10,000. The question of obtaining money by sale of bonds is not at all difficult, and for all that one loan of $25,000 does not do as much good as ten of $2,500.

I think I agree with that. I am only offering to say so in the law.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator is absolutely right in saying that probably the policy which has been pursued up to this time under the present law, of giving the small man a preference, ought to be continued. I am quite sure it will be continued. But if the Senator's amendment is adopted, then the board will lose the discretion to accommodate, except upon the happening of certain contingencies, the larger demand that may be made upon it, although the board may in its judgment believe that the borrower who wants $25,000 is much more in need of accommodation than the man who wants the lesser sum.

The amendment would take from the board all discretion, except under certain conditions, to accommodate the larger application, notwithstanding its judgment as to the merits of the application and as to the necessity of relieving him against a condition which would be absolutely disastrous and possibly ruinous to him. I want to preserve that discretion in the board, to be exercised upon its judgment. I assume that it will exercise that judgment in favor of the small man, where the conditions permit it, after we make the increase, just exactly in the same way as they have exercised it heretofore when they were under no compulsion or direction to prefer the smaller man. If they have preferred the smaller man under the present law where there is no direction to them to do it, and where they are acting simply upon their judgment, what reason has the Senator to believe they will not continue to pursue that same policy when we increase the amount?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think it would interfere with that question at all. I think it is just a question of fact. When they ascertain that they are limited in the funds on hand and have not sufficient on hand to meet the obligations which are qualified under the law, that is one instance in which they may withhold the larger loans.

Mr. SIMMONS. But when they do find the fact, and that fact is that they have approved of smaller loans to the extent that their funds would be exhausted, then by reason of that fact they are deprived of exercising the discretion to help the large applicants.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, when we were discussing the awful condition of the farmers and the cattlemen of the country during drastic deflation we were told the Federal reserve system was not intended to serve their needs. Now, when we come to make provision to reach these people and to serve their needs we are finding opposition. We were told at that time that we ought to create new agencies. Now we are undertaking to create those agencies, and yet it seems that restrictions are to be placed around the provisions looking to the relief of the farmer. Now, it seems that some want to do just as little as possible for the farmer.

I think there is great merit in the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I would like to see the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] accepted. I think that would clear the matter up entirely. It would still leave discretion in the hands of the board. The board could continue to make the $25,000 loans. The board has the discretion of saying whether the funds are too low to continue them or not. They are the judges, and nobody knows the condition better than the members of the board.

Now, Mr. President, I have had some letters from my State suggesting that the amount of certain loans ought to be increased; that there were people who needed $25,000; that $10,000 would not serve the purpose. I think that is true, and I am willing to increase it to $25,000. I know, and everyone who has had any business experience knows, that the man with $25,000 worth of collateral has more influence with any board with discretion than the poor fellow has who wants $500 or $1,000. I am trying to reach the man who has no entrée to any bank now. I want to reach the fellow who is not influential with these boards, which never come in contact with the struggling poor. Here is an opportunity to reach that very class.

The cattle industry had become a considerable industry in my State until it was slaughtered and sacrificed by the ravages of deflation in 1920 and 1921. If the cattlemen of my State could have borrowed money so they could have gone through that time, they could have saved their cattle and the cattle industry in Alabama would have been flourishing to-day. But as the result of deflation they were practically wiped out and were discouraged and cast down with tremendous losses on their hands.

Now, we want to prevent the recurrence of such a thing as that, and here is the opportunity to do it. The question is, Will Senators do it? I know that the proposition does not appeal to certain Senators. I am the friend of the commercial banking system. When I see the commercial banking system put to the test and it fails to reach a large portion of our people and permits their enterprise and industry to perish, I am in favor of amending the banking laws and going to the rescue of such people. This is their Government. They have a right to ask us to give them machinery that will take care of their interests. I want these little men who can get money nowhere else to be given the opportunity to get it. God knows they need it.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to an incident which I once before mentioned here which illustrates the point I have in mind. A young man in the West purchased, I believe, in the fall of 1920, $2,000 worth of cattle, not many of them, and he borrowed the money with which to pay for them. He went out and started a little ranch. He had some increase in the number of his cattle, and the next year when his paper became due he tried to renew his note, telling the bank officials that he was not able to pay; but they forced him to the wall; they drove his cattle to market and sold them. They brought but $1,300, though he had borrowed the money and paid $2,000 for them. He went out of business; he went back to the city, with a $700 debt hanging over his head still unpaid. That is but one instance, Mr. President, among thousands and tens of thousands. Now we are trying to reach that needy class. Here is an opportunity to reach them through the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], but we are told that we must not put that amendment in the bill.

I am not in favor of leaving too many discretionary powers in the hands of boards. I once saw a Federal Reserve Board use its discretionary power to the destruction of $15,000,000,000 worth of agricultural products, including cattle, to the ruin of millions of people, to the driving to death of thousands of men and women, who took their own lives, and to the driving of others to the madhouse. That result came through discretionary power which was exercised by a board under the control of Governor Harding and the big conscienceless financiers and speculators of Wall Street. I am not in favor of leaving discretionary powers in the hands of those who use those powers to the hurt and injury of the masses of the people.

Mr. President, when I advocated a credit system here I had in mind a bill that would provide for loaning money to the man with five head of cattle or three head of cattle. Any man who wishes to start business, I do not care how small it might be, in this great country, ought to be able to get the capital with which to start it and to aid him until he makes it a going business. Is not that a fair proposition? I wish to say to Senators who oppose this amendment that $500 to one of these poor struggling fellows is as much as is $25,000 to a man who has accumulated a fair share of this world's goods and has collateral through which he may get money from some other source. I wish this banking system to reach out and aid the little fellow to get on his feet and to make his business a going business. That ought to be the purpose of a statesman. We ought not to legislate special privileges into the hands of any particular class, but we ought to legislate for the masses and for the good of all. I want the man who needs $25,000 to get it; I want the one who needs $20,000 to get it, or the ones who need $15,000 or $12,000 or $10,000 or $5,000 or $3,000 or $1,000 to get it; and let us provide sufficient funds for that purpose.

There was not any question about funds not being sufficient when gamblers were speculating in cotton at 40 cents and beating it down to 10 cents. They got millions and hundreds of millions of dollars in New York for that purpose. Why should we now draw a picture of a situation showing that this Government is not capable of providing a financial agency by which money enough can be provided to keep the agricultural industry and the cattle industry going in the United States? There will come no such time if we shall have the right kind of men in this Chamber and in the other. It is the duty of the Government to see to it that the industries which feed and clothe the world are not crucified for the gain of a favored few. We might just as well face the issue plainly.

Mr. President, I hope the amendment of the Senator from Florida will prevail. I think it is a righteous amendment. It is all right to provide for those who desire to get $25,000; I am in favor of having the limitation increased to that extent; but I wish at the same time to specifically provide for the taking care of those who seek loans for amounts less than $10,000. That is the proposition in a nutshell.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] as modified.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. 304. That the second subdivision of section 5 of the United States cotton futures act, approved August 11, 1916, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"Second. (a) Specify as the class of the contract one of the following classes:

"Class A, which shall include only middling fair, strict good middling, good middling, and strict middling grades;

"Class B, which shall include only strict middling, middling, strict low middling, and good middling yellow tinged grades;

"Class C, which shall include only strict low middling, low middling, strict middling yellow tinged, and good middling yellow stained grades.

"(b) Specify the basis grade for the cotton involved in the contract, which shall be one of the grades for which standards are established by the Secretary of Agriculture, and which shall be one of the grades included within a class in paragraph (a) of this subdivision; the price per pound at which the cotton of such basis grade is contracted to be bought or sold; the date when the purchase or sale was made; and the month or months in which the contract is to be fulfilled or settled.

"(c) If no other class is specified in the contract, or in the memorandum evidencing the same, the contract shall be deemed a Class B contract.

"(d) If no other basis grade be specified in the contract, or in the memorandum evidencing the same, good middling shall be deemed the basis grade incorporated into a Class A contract, middling shall be deemed the basis grade incorporated into a Class B contract, and low middling shall be deemed the basis grade incorporated into a Class C contract. It is further specified that in case delivery is demanded at least one-third of each contract shall be filled in the basic grades specified herein, and that the other two-thirds shall be filled either in that grade or in one of the other grades specified in said class."

That the third subdivision of section 5 of such act is amended to read as follows:

"Third. Provide that the cotton dealt with therein or delivered thereunder shall be of or within the grades for which standards are established by the Secretary of Agriculture, and of or within the grades included within the class so specified or incorporated as the class of the contract, and that cotton of any other grade or grades shall not be dealt with therein nor delivered thereunder."

That the fifth subdivision of section 5 of such act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"Fifth. Provide that cotton that, because of the presence of extraneous matter of any character, or irregularities or defects, is reduced in value below that of strict middling in the case of a Class A contract, strict low middling in the case of a Class B contract, or low middling in the case of a Class C contract, the grades mentioned being of the official cotton standards of the United States, or cotton that is less than seven-eighths of an inch in length of staple, or cotton of perished staple or of immature staple, or cotton that is 'gin cut' or reginned, or cotton that is 'repacked' or 'false packed' or 'mixed packed' or 'water packed,' shall not be delivered on, under, or in settlement of such contract."

That the second paragraph of the seventh subdivision of section 5 of such act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"The provisions of the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh subdivisions of this section shall be deemed fully incorporated into any such contract if there be written or printed thereon, or on the memorandum evidencing the same, at or prior to the time the same is signed, the phrase 'subject to United States cotton futures act, section 5, Class A,' if the contract is a Class A contract, or the phrase 'subject to United States cotton futures act, section 5, Class B,' if the contract is a Class B contract, or the phrase 'subject to United States cotton futures act, section 5, Class C,' if the contract is a Class C contract."

That the provisions of this act shall be effective on and after the thirtieth day after its passage, but such provisions shall not be construed as applicable to nor as affecting any right, power, privilege, or immunity under any contract entered into prior to such day.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I am glad that we are about to pass a law to make funds more available for the agricultural interests of this country; but, while we are doing that, it is our duty to see if we can not benefit their interest in other respects.

I have an amendment, which has just been sent up to the desk and read, which is somewhat technical. I did not expect all Senators to grasp it from the reading, but it is very simple, as they will see when I explain it a little later.

To my mind, an amendment of that kind to this law would be of greater benefit to the people of the South than any other law that we could possibly pass. It is commendable to try to secure funds which shall be available to help people to farm, but it is useless for them to raise a crop and then turn around and be robbed in marketing that crop.

I do not like to use harsh language, such as "robbery" and similar phrases, because that is so common and sounds so demagogic. I have heard all my life that the South was robbed by Wall Street, and by this interest and that interest and the other interest. If I could not show where the wrong is, and if I could not point out the remedy, I would remain silent; but this matter of a cotton-future contract has simply deprived the people of my section since the Civil War of hundreds of millions of dollars every year. The trouble is that the public do not understand the law. They are afraid to look into it. They have different reasons.

Some will say that it is too complicated. Mr. President, I admit that it is a technical proposition; it is somewhat of a legal proposition; but it is not too complicated to look into and to correct when we see the wrong of it. Our A, B, C's were complicated until we studied them and learned them, and it is the same way with this cotton-future contract proposition.

Some Senators will brush it aside and say: "No; I do not understand it." Of course, you do not, unless you study it a little. I did not understand it for a long time in my life, but it is just simply legalized robbery—nothing short of it.

I realize that some of the Senators from the South differ on the proposition; but I am going now to appeal to every man in the Senate, and particularly to the Representatives of the South, to study this proposition and see what I am driving at. Of course, some of them already know, but I am afraid they do not realize, the great injustice that is inflicted upon our people. I ask them to lay aside any prejudice or favoritism and study the proposition as a business one, or as a legal proposition, or as a moral proposition.

It is not very pleasant to tell the world of our misfortunes and of our poverty, to be always whining about being poor. I hate to hear it, Mr. President; but when we look at the conditions that obtain in the South, there is no alternative except for our people to be poor. All my life I have been an optimist. I look on the bright side of life. I believe in work, and I believe in more work; but I have come now to the point where I am ready to strike for the cotton growers of this country, and I say that with all deliberation and after most thorough investigation.

I shall not read long to the Senate, and I shall not detain you long with my speech; but I have in my hand the report of the Joint Agricultural Commission of Congress, filed last year some time. They go into a close analysis and a calculation of the cost of production of cotton. I desire to have inserted in the RECORD the parts that I have marked.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

It may be helpful at this point to give a typical illustration of the outlook for landowner and tenant. Let us take a 30-acre farm unit, valued at $1,500 and including 25 acres of cleared land. This is occupied by a tenant farmer who furnishes all the implements and labor, including mule power, and receives half the cotton and all the grain crop for his services. The landlord's account will appear about as follows:

Landlord's account:
Debit—
Taxes	$25.00
Interest and depreciation	150.00
Fertilizer for cotton	90.00
Cotton seed	10.00
Half of cost of ginning and baling	12.50
Supervision	100.00
Total	387.50
Credit—
One-half of 5 bales of cotton, at 16 cents a pound	200.00
2½ tons cotton seed, at $30	75.00
Total	275.00
Landlord's loss	112.50
Tenant's account:
Debit—
Feed of mule	75.00
Depreciation and interest on mule	25.00
Taxes	5.00
Fertilizer for 10 acres corn and grain, at $3	30.00
Depreciation and repairs, implements	10.00
Half of cost of ginning and baling	12.50
Total	157.50
Credit—
One-half of 5 bales of cotton, at 16 cents a pound	200.00
75 bushels of corn	50.00
100 bushels of oats	50.00
2 tons of hay	40.00
Total	340.00
Return received by tenant	182.50

The balance of $182.50 represents labor for the entire year for man, wife, and two children, which is 61 cents per day for 300 days. On a 365-day basis, this gives a total revenue of 10 cents per day for each member of the tenant's family of four. That these figures are not overdrawn can be readily proven by reference to the production statistics of the Department of Agriculture which are readily available. The Census Bureau reports 1,890,000 farms producing cotton in 1919. This for the crop of 1921 would give 4½ bales per farm. Assuming only one family per farm (a totally unwarranted conclusion) this would give each share-cropping farmer 2½ bales, or a revenue of $170 from cotton.

What would the cost of production of farm products be if farm labor were allowed a wage commensurate to that received by the coal miner, the railroad worker, the brick mason, or the factory operative? Your committee has not the data upon which to base this calculation, but states without fear of contradiction that no price received, even at the peak prices, will give the actual producer of farm products a wage comparable in any way with that normally received by all classes of union labor and even by most classes of farm labor elsewhere in the United States.

Mr. DIAL. Briefly, it says this, Mr. President: It goes into detail of the cost of a bale of cotton, the cost of a pound of cotton. It shows that a man and his wife and two children in an ordinary year, producing an ordinary crop of cotton, and marketing that cotton at 18 cents a pound, which is away above the average, reap the magnificent reward of 10 cents a day each. That is not my statement. That is the statement of the Joint Agricultural Commission of the House and Senate, composed of some of the best men in each of these bodies. It says, down there:

The balance of $182.50 represents labor for the entire year for man, wife, and two children, which is 61 cents per day for 300 days. On a 365-day basis, this gives a total revenue of 10 cents per day for each member of the tenant's family of four.

I will not bore the Senate by reading other extracts, but here is the situation. People talk about the pauper labor of Asia; but when we have any such condition as just read right here in the United States, it is time that this body was waking up and amending this law. Therefore I am ready to advise our people to stop planting cotton—and I do not like to use that term—but we have been raising cotton all these years at something under the cost of production, and we can not stand it any longer. In my State, two years ago, we raised 1,600,000 bales of cotton. Last year we raised less than 800,000 bales and this season we have raised only about 520,000 bales.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am among those who have never been able to understand the Senator's bill, and I hope he will make it clear.

Mr. DIAL. I am coming to that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I assume that it is not the price of the cotton which makes the remuneration of the raiser so small, but I do not know whether or not it is legislation that the Senator is complaining of——

Mr. DIAL. Yes, sir; it is.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And I should like to know, if that is the case, when the adverse legislation began, and of what it consisted.

Mr. DIAL. I thank the Senator very much for interrupting me. I will come right to that, and I shall be glad to have any Senator interrupt me, because this is not a speech on my part. I do not like to speak if I can help it, but I do love to talk a little business; and when I see a wrong, if I can point out the remedy I will try to be specific, and I thank the Senator for interrupting me.

I want to show you first the condition that we are in. That is where we are now. We are getting that kind of pay for our cotton, and the reason why we are not getting any more is the unjust law on the subject.

You will say: "Why is the law unjust? When did you wake up and find out that it was unjust? How is it unjust?" and all that kind of question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. When was it passed?

Mr. DIAL. In 1914. I will come to that presently, but I want first to show how it is that we live under this system.

I take it that a good many of the people who know anything about future contracts are afraid to say so, because they are afraid it will hurt their reputation, or hurt their credit, or something of that sort, and they go around and whisper about it. We have gotten beyond the whispering stage now. If you will excuse me for saying so, I know something about raising cotton, and I know something about warehousing cotton, and I know something about milling cotton, and I know something about the operation of the future contract, and I think I am familiar with what I am talking about.

There was no law on this subject until 1914. Before that time, from the Civil War, there was a custom of selling contracts. Before the Civil War there was no such thing as selling future contracts. At that time the actual cotton was sold on the spot, on the plantation or at the town, or shipped to commission merchants on the seacoast, principally, and the commission merchants sold the actual cotton. I am not fighting the Civil War over. I do not want to get your ill will on that ground, although I have no apologies to make for it. During the Civil War the question came up of selling cotton to arrive, making a contract to get cotton to come. Then they sold that contract. Then they got to dealing in the contract, and kept on selling contracts and contracts. That was the origin of future contracts in this country. In New York they had a kind of a joint-stock concern after the Civil War, for a year or two. In 1871 the New York Cotton Exchange was actually organized, in July.

About 1869 the cable was completed to Liverpool. A man named John Rue was a commission merchant handling cotton, and when the cable had been laid he could wire over here and buy cotton, and he would sell it there "to come." He could sell the contracts for the cotton "to arrive." That was the origin of the exchange in Liverpool.

They dealt in those contracts from time to time, and there was no law regulating it. The injustice of those contracts was this: Under the custom the man bought a contract, and he thought he bought middling cotton, but he did not buy middling cotton, he bought on the basis of middling. Then, when the delivery day came, they did not give him middling cotton; they gave him cotton better than middling or inferior to middling, and they regulated the price by the exchange price. They would give a discount off for cotton under middling, or a premium on for cotton above middling.

Mr. KING. I am trying to follow the Senator, but it is a technical subject——

Mr. DIAL. I realize it is a technical proposition, and dull.

Mr. KING. As I understand the Senator now, he is talking about the contract. He is describing the system after the introduction of the contract system of which he has been speaking.

Mr. DIAL. That is entirely correct.

Mr. KING. Would not the contract describe the character of the article which the vendor was to sell and the vendee was to purchase, and if it did not, could not the prospective vendee prescribe the terms, and say that he was to buy cotton of this grade or that grade or the other grade, so specify it that if the kind of cotton for which he contracted was not delivered, he could either repudiate the contract——

Mr. DIAL. No; and I thank the Senator for asking that question. I will explain it. He bought his contract, and that meant a contract on the basis of middling. That is where the trouble came in. A man did not buy middling cotton, he bought on the basis of middling, with the right of the seller of the contract to slide his contract down or up. It was left entirely with him as to what grade of cotton he would deliver. The vendee had no rights whatever, except to accept what was tendered him, or to sell out his contract.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I can not understand why——

Mr. DIAL. Just a moment. Under this custom, down to 1914, until Congress passed a law on the subject, the vendor had a right to deliver any one of 32 grades on that contract, with the price adjusted up or down.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator contend that the courts would make a new contract and compel a vendee to take cotton he did not buy, which he did not describe in his contract? The Senator states that there were 32 grades. Suppose the vendee wanted to buy the thirtieth grade, and he contracted with the Senator for 50 bales or 1,000 bales of grade No. 30?

Mr. DIAL. They would not sell you less than 100 bales. They would only sell you on the basis of middling; not middling, but on the basis of middling. The price would be fixed at middling, but if he tendered you the thirty-second grade, you would get a discount; but you had no discretion as to what grade you should receive. That was in the contract. Of course the courts would have nothing to do with it. If the Senator will wait a moment, I will get down to the present law.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Who dictated that contract?

Mr. DIAL. The exchange. That was a standard contract of the exchange.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Where?

Mr. DIAL. New York and New Orleans, in this country, and they have one for Liverpool, Bremen, Havre, Alexandria, and other exchanges of the world; but I am dealing particularly with the contracts of New Orleans and New York. I am speaking of the custom now. That is not exactly germane to the point, except to show the contract and how we got into our present condition.

At that time the seller would sell on the basis of middling, and he had a right to deliver any one of 32 different grades of cotton. Assuming the price of middling was at 20 cents a pound, and if the seller delivered you below middling, you would get a discount. At that time the difference was fixed by arbitration through the exchanges. If a different grade than middling were tendered and the seller and the buyer could not agree on the price, an arbitration would be ordered and they would fix the price of that grade; and that is what you would have to settle at. That was the custom. I am trying to show how naturally we got into this condition and how unreasonable it was.

Mr. ASHURST. What is the reason why they did not change their contracts and, instead of saying on the basis of middling, simply saying middling?

Mr. DIAL. I will come to that when I come to the present law. The custom is not germane now, except to show the history of the thing.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well.

Mr. DIAL. That was the custom. Unfortunately, our people did not get it changed for many years. The South complained most bitterly. We appealed to Congress and had bills introduced from 1884 to 1914 before we could ever get that custom changed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator explain why the South objected to that custom?

Mr. DIAL. The South objected to the custom because of the inequality of that character of contract. If the Senator will allow me, I am trying to help the grower of cotton, but not in a demagogic way. I do not ask for favors for any class of my constituents, but I am trying to have passed an honest, fair, equitable, just, and mutual law. I do not ask for any favors for any class. They submitted to it because they could not help themselves. If you can help the grower of cotton, then the exporter, the mill, and everybody else will regulate themselves accordingly. But the poor man who grows the cotton can not help himself. I do not ask Congress to favor him, but I say we have no right to keep a dishonest, one-sided law on top of him.

My contention is this: That the price of that future contract controls the price of the spot cotton. Unquestionably that is so; not absolutely in every case, but that custom prevailed over the world. As the future contract goes up or down, the price of spot cotton goes up or down. I ask Senators to get this in their minds. The interests of the grower of cotton and the buyer of contracts are identical. They both want the price of cotton to go up, of course. The man who sells the contract, who is called the "bear," wants the contract to go down. He does not care anything about the price of spot cotton, but he wants to run the contract down.

You naturally say, Why does he care anything about the contract if he has sold it? What has he to do with it? Is he not out of it? No; he did not have any cotton to sell. He merely sold a contract, and he expects to buy the contract in. Therefore he will do everything in his power to put the price of the contract down. He will use every argument in the world to get the price of the contract down, and when the contract goes down the price of spot cotton goes down in sympathy with it.

That is what I am complaining about. Therefore that contract ought to be an honest contract, it ought to be a mutual contract, it ought to be a contract like any other contract in the world, specifying exactly what you are trading in, and then the vendor should be required to deliver what he specifies. But that is what has not been done, or was not done before this custom went out of vogue, and is not being done now.

We from the South appealed to Congress for 30 years, and I say, to the disgrace of Congress, they turned a deaf ear to the South and allowed that nefarious custom to prevail and to control the price of cotton all the while.

About two weeks ago a cotton buyer came to my office here in the city and said that I was absolutely right in trying to get this corrected. He said that old custom was so outrageous that they would tender what we would call "dog-tail" cotton, cotton that was not spinnable, cotton hardly marketable. They would tender that on a contract. I will not go into details, as it is not necessary to do that, but he said he knew of men—and I knew them and I knew of the transactions before 1914—who thought they would buy contracts and demand delivery of cotton and see what they would get, and they did demand delivery. They made up a pool and shipped cotton from New York to South Carolina, and they could not spin it in the cotton mills. This buyer told me that they kept some of that cotton in their warehouses, and they could not get rid of it, and he bought the cotton for a waste mill and used it in a waste mill. If Senators are interested, I would be very glad to give the names and all about the contracts. That kind of a deal would depress the price of the commodity.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understood that the Senator and the South generally objected to the old custom.

Mr. DIAL. We did. We begged Congress to correct it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Finally legislation was passed, was it not?

Mr. DIAL. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And now the Senator is objecting to the legislation?

Mr. DIAL. No; I want to have it amended. The legislation was one of the best laws that was ever passed for the South. It helped them wonderfully. I am coming to that. I just wanted to show how we inherited this proposition. We did not create it, but we were born in it. We could not help it It was there at our birth, and it was fastened upon us. We appealed to Congress. We did all that poor, suffering, downtrodden people could do, and I say, to the shame of Congress, not that I think Congress would then, and I know they would not now, legislate against us knowingly, but I must complain of the indifference of Congressmen on this question. Senators rise here and talk about trying to help foreigners, and this, that, and the other, and spend a great deal of time in long speeches, but when it comes down to a business proposition they do not want to sit down around a table and study it out and find a remedy. That is what I am complaining about.

If the Senator from Nebraska will give me his attention, we inherited this nefarious practice of the seller selling on the basis of middling and having the right to deliver any one of 32 different grades of cotton.

My father was a successful farmer, and he complained until the day of his death—he died before 1914—that the exchanges kept a lot of dog-tail cotton on hand, and therefore depressed the price of the contract; hence depressed the price of his actual cotton. If Senators will excuse me for saying it, he was the right kind of a farmer. He made his living on his farm and was self-sustaining and did not have to go to the Government or to the banks to borrow money

Of course, we need funds at certain times to help us over hard places, but it is frequently an injury to men to borrow money. If I had not borrowed a little in 1920 I would have been better off to-day.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is the Senator going to indicate what the legislation was and why he wants it changed?

Mr. DIAL. I am coming to that. As Judge Watts, on the bench of South Carolina, would say, that is "the milk in the coconut."

I want to say here that I accord to the framers of the present law every praise. It was perhaps the best they could do at the time. Senators can see how we were suffering before. They cut out 12 grades of this off-grade stuff, which was nontenderable, and the law made 20 grades tenderable on a contract. Then later Congress cut out 10 grades more, and the law to-day provides that 10 grades shall be tenderable on a contract, instead of the old custom of 32 grades tenderable on the contract. Therefore Senators can see they improved it wonderfully.

I am afraid some of those gentleman think that that was a piece of perfection and that that legislation ought to stand for all time. It did help a great deal and they passed a good law, but they had two sections in it, which I will explain in a minute, which should be changed. They have no right to resent an attempt to amend that law. The original Constitution of the United States was a pretty good piece of legislation, but it has been amended, and I say with all reverence I believe if our Saviour had lived longer in the flesh the New Testament would have been added to. But some of our friends from the South think it is almost sacrilege to come here and say anything against that legislation.

Section 5, let me say to the Senator from Nebraska, provides that the seller of the contract has the right to deliver any one of 10 grades on the contract. You still buy and sell the contract on the basis of middling, but the seller of the contract has the right to deliver any one of 10 grades on the contract, as he sees proper, or mix it up and give you some of all the 10 grades. That is where our good friends, the legislators, "slipped up," to use the common street parlance.

I now call the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to the fact that under this present law they have only 10 grades tenderable on the contract. The contract is still made on the basis of middling. You do not buy middling, you understand, and that is where the trouble comes in. You buy on the basis of middling. You put up your money on the basis of middling, but the seller of the contract has a right to give you any one of 10 grades, or mix up all the 10 grades, as he sees proper.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIAL. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I would like to know the Senator's view as to the power of Congress to go into the States and provide the kind of contract that may be written between the grower of agricultural crops and the purchaser of agricultural crops. Where is the authority? Is it under the interstate commerce power of the Constitution?

Mr. DIAL. It is.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that it is no business of Congress to say what kind of contracts shall be entered into between the grower of cotton and the purchaser of cotton, or the kind of the grades that may be classified in a certain category. It is not the business of Congress to say that I, if I buy a certain grade of cotton, shall be compelled to take some other grade. It seems to me when Congress seeks to interfere with the making of contracts between the vendor and the vendee it transcends its authority and its act is unconstitutional.

Mr. DIAL. The Senator is a great lawyer, but he does not know the facts. He did not buy a particular kind. The purchaser signed the sliding contract. The law could not change that. We were not wanting to come to Congress. We appealed to the State legislatures before 1914 and every Southern State passed a law on the subject, called the antibucket shop law. But the States were incompetent or powerless to cope with the evil and, therefore, we thought it better to have a national law, and we did appeal to Congress then. It was thought at the time, as the Senator said, that Congress would have no jurisdiction of the subject matter, but things have been creeping to Washington and crowding Washington pretty strong, absorbing or assuming jurisdiction where we did not have any here, and it is now pretty well admitted that Congress has a right to govern the subject of legislating on the subjects under three clauses of the Constitution, first, the interstate commerce clause, second, the Post Office clause, and, third, the taxing power clause. That matter has been pretty well adjudicated by the courts.

So we were glad to have Congress take care of it because of the iniquitous system in operation on the cotton exchange. They sell these contracts on the exchange and they flash it by wire over the country, and that quotation fixes the price of our actual cotton. Therefore, we tried to get an honest contract, a fair contract, and let it represent the actual value of the cotton.

Now, that shows some of the history of the matter. The framers of the present law did well. They improved the situation considerably, but unfortunately they put those two sections in the law. If they had not put section 5 in the law, but had let section 10 stand, which specified the grade, that would have been perfectly well. But unfortunately the New York Cotton Exchange never sold a single contract under section 10 and would not deal in that way. They will not make a contract specifying the particular grade of cotton.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. DIAL. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. STANLEY. Is the Senator advised—I am not—as to whether any Federal legislation on this question attempts to govern contracts affecting the sale of cotton except in interstate transactions?

Mr. DIAL. This particular law was based on the taxing power. They tax certain contracts, but they exempt everything else. It was not the object to raise revenue, to be candid, but it was for Congress to get jurisdiction of the subject matter. I think it could as well have been put under the postal clause as under the taxing clause. The particular law to which I have referred is based on the taxing law.

Mr. STANLEY. Is there a Federal tax on these contracts?

Mr. DIAL. Yes; but they exempt pretty much everything. It was just to get jurisdiction.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator have in mind the decisions of the Supreme Court dealing with the question?

Mr. DIAL. Yes. If the Senator will read the speech of Mr. Francis G. Caffey, who was solicitor for the Agricultural Department in 1914, he will find it a most interesting speech, which goes into all the details of the subject. He is a very fine lawyer, located now in New York.

Mr. KING. Yes; I know of him. I am speaking of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. DIAL. Yes; that is what I refer to also.

Mr. KING. Where will I find the speech?

Mr. DIAL. It will be found in the Agricultural Department, or my office will be glad to furnish it to any Senator who will telephone for it.

What I am complaining about is the indefiniteness of the contract. It is abnormal. There is no law, there is no custom in the world, that authorizes the seller of a commodity to select the quality for the purchaser. Any contract made on that basis necessarily depreciates the value of the commodity. Anyone can see how unjust it would be. To give a very plain illustration of the way it works, suppose the wife of the Senator from Utah told him to stop by the drygoods store this afternoon and bring her a spool of thread, No. 60 white. She had a fine needle on the machine, and was making a fine dress for the baby. The Senator would go to the store, and the clerk would say, "Yes; we have No. 60 white thread, all right, but you must take No. 10 white. It is good thread. We are the sellers, and under the cotton law we have the right to select the quality for you, and you must take that home. We are allowing you that at a discount." But the Senator does not want that particular quality of thread at all. It is not suitable for the particular use. But under the cotton law he is required to take it.

I beg Senators to bear in mind that there is no use having any prejudice against the cotton mill. There is nowhere else for our cotton to go but to the mills. We can not eat it. We can not wear it until it has gone through the mill, and the mills purchase in the open market in competition with the world.

Our friends out West have a little prejudice against the people in the East along that line. But there is no mill built where one kind of machinery can use the 10 grades of cotton. Certainly they could not do it advantageously. A mill is built to manufacture certain grades of cotton, and the other grades of cotton can not be used in that mill. It is necessary to have it all of one grade or of kindred grades of cotton. Therefore the contract I am discussing is not useful; it is abnormal. No man would pay as much for a contract when he would know that the other man had the right to give him any one of 10 qualities under the contract.

Some of my good friends from the South have said to me that it is unkind to growl about the contract. They say, "When one bought the contract he knew that his rights were not equal with the seller, and hence he did not pay as much for the contract as he would have paid if he had known what kind of cotton he was going to get. Therefore he got a discount and ought not to kick." Now, that sounds pretty reasonable and that, to be candid with the Senate, flabbergasted me a little bit, if I may use the term. But that is erroneous reasoning. He bought it at a discount; that is true. It is argued that if he bought it with his eyes open he ought not to complain.

Mr. KING. Caveat emptor!

Mr. DIAL. That is right; but here is the trouble about that. Here is a way to illustrate that. I am not complaining about the purchaser of the contract. He bought it knowing that the chances were against him and that the other fellow had his cards marked, and so he ought not to complain. But here is what I am complaining about: The future market fixes the price of the spot market, and when that quotation goes out it fixes the price on the platform down in my little town and everywhere. It is like this:

I say, "Senator, you are a wheat man?" "Yes; I am selling wheat." "I would like to buy a thousand bushels and take a little chance with you on a contract. What is the price?" "Seventy-five cents per bushel." "That is pretty good; a little cheaper than I thought. Here is my check." "Wait a minute, now. I am only selling 3 pecks for a bushel." "I did not know that. I thought it was a little cheap. I thought wheat ought to be about a dollar a bushel." "I am selling 3 pecks for a bushel."

Now, the Senator and I would understand each other. I would be buying that wheat with my eyes open. We would be at arms length with each other. That is our little private transaction and nobody else ought to have anything to say about it. But what I am kicking about is that when it goes out in the afternoon paper that wheat was bringing 75 cents a bushel and that fixes the price of Jim Jones's wheat, who only raises 49 bushels and sells 4 pecks for a bushel and who knows nothing about this exchange dealing, then he is hurt and he is the man for whom I am complaining. The contract ought to be an open contract. It ought to be a mutual contract, a specific contract. It ought to be a contract representing the actual commodity, like every other contract in the world.

The quotations go down to my little town in the morning at 10 o'clock. I have some cotton in the warehouse myself. I say to the buyer, "John, I want to sell my cotton." "All right. What do you want?" "I want 28." "You are out of line. Here is a quotation for January cotton in New York, 27 cents a pound." Those quotations are all over the South every day in the year, from 10 o'clock in the morning until 3 o'clock in the afternoon. I look at the quotation and I say, "I want 28 cents." "But you ask more than the contract for the actual cotton in New York."

Now, that quotation is a lie, to use plain English language. I do not say that in a vicious way, but it is a falsehood; it is a misrepresentation; it is spurious. It is true if you can get your telegram there quick enough and your margin in the bank you could buy that contract at that price, but it is also true that you have not bought any particular grade of cotton. You have bought on the basis of middling cotton, and the other fellow can give you any other grade of cotton he wants to. They use that to deprive our people of a large proportion of the value of every pound of cotton they raise. It depresses the market and it hurts us in our buying power. It cripples all the people in the United States. It takes cotton out of the United States at less price than it should bring to other countries of the world, and they compete with us.

Mr. ASHURST. Then why does the Senator sign that kind of a contract?

Mr. DIAL. Exchange members will not trade in any other way.

In 1920 we raised in the United States less than 13,500,000 bales of cotton. On the New York and New Orleans exchanges alone in 1920 they contracted for over 128,000,000 bales of cotton. I am talking about the man who is not a member of the exchange, the man who never bought or sold a contract in his life and who knows nothing about an exchange, the honest man, the toiling man, who works on the farm and who raises perhaps only 10 or 15 or 20 bales of cotton a year.

Mr. ASHURST. Would not the Senator desire a law to prevent fictitious sales?

Mr. DIAL. Yes; and I am coming to that in a moment. I want to get the idea into the system of the Senator from Arizona and into the system of every Senator present; and I do not care whether he listens to what I am saying or not, if he will just go over the proposition in his own mind and in his own way and not be influenced by what I may say or by anything anyone else may say. Senators have the brains and the ability to make their own decisions on the question, and that is all I ask them to do. They do not need to know cotton or ever to have seen a bale of cotton in their lives or even to know anything about the cotton-future contract, but they can take the principle of the thing and see that here is a contract that allows a man to sell according to sample, to wit, according to middling. Then the law allows that man to change, to deliver some other grade under that contract.

Suppose there were 10 pocketknives over there on that table and a Senator made a contract to buy one and the seller had the right to select any one of them he wanted and deliver it, the Senator would not pay as much for that kind of an open contract as he would for a specific contract. More particularly is such a practice inappropriate when the commodity has to be used in machinery. The buyer will get some kind of good cotton, but he will not get the kind that he can use.

It has been suggested that if a man buys a contract he takes a chance on it and he ought not to complain. I am not caring anything about those who buy the contract, if we could keep them from affecting the price of spot cotton, whether they pay 10 cents a pound or 20 cents a pound or 49 cents a pound, but when that quotation goes out to the public I want it to be an honest quotation, a mutual quotation, one which will represent the actual commodity. That is what I am trying to get at. It is analagous to the case of wheat.

It is said if the man sells a contract and the buyer knew he had no choice under it, he ought to sell out the contract or take whatever is delivered. My good friend the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] says: "Even if some other kind of cotton is delivered, you have obtained it at the market price. Will a man complain if he has to take something at the market price?" He said to me, "You are the hardest man to satisfy I ever saw." Let us see about that. I was again flabbergasted for a little while, but here is the fallacy of it, as I have indicated to the Senate heretofore.

I would not give $2 for a pair of brogan shoes; I do not want to wear brogans. They may be worth $2, and some people will pay $2 for them; but they do not suit me; and I do not want to go out and sell somebody a pair of brogans. Neither does the man who needs one grade of cotton want to take another grade and hunt up a purchaser for that other grade. He can not use it and he can not export it, but he has got to pay for it; and it takes a heap of money. The buyer has to pay storage charges and insurance; he has to take all the risk; he has got to run the risk of the cotton being burned up, and all that sort of thing. Therefore the man who has bought the contract does not want to take some other cotton even at the market price. When a man goes to a tailor and has a suit of clothes made and they fit him all right, he settles up with the tailor; but suppose the suit of clothes does not suit him, does not come up to specifications, does the tailor say, "What are you growling about? Pay me what you owe. They will fit somebody else. I made a mistake in making them for you; I slipped up on my measurements; but you get them at the market price." That is the proposition.

However, Mr. President, that is not the main point of my argument. Here is what I am talking about: When that cotton quotation goes out on the market, that false quotation fixes the price of the cotton of John Smith, who has raised 13 bales of cotton, and he can not help himself. I want that quotation to represent the actual cotton.

It is asked, "What are you kicking about? Did you not get the market price"? The point is, however, that the market price would have been higher if it had not been for this inequality in the contract. I hope Senators get that, for that is the gravamen of my argument. On account of the inequality in the contract, nobody will pay as much for that kind of contract as he would for a contract that specified the identical grade.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as I understand the position of the Senator it is that the contract has so much flexibility that it permits compliance with it upon the part of the man who sells it by delivering a grade of cotton less valuable perhaps than that which the purchaser desires.

Mr. DIAL. It might be more valuable and yet not be the kind that he desires.

Mr. KING. But, at any rate, it is flexible, so that a great many grades may be sold under that particular contract?

Mr. DIAL. Exactly.

Mr. KING. So that, for illustration, if I should buy a contract, I have got to take into account that I may not get the kind of cotton that I desire. I may have foisted upon me an inferior or a lesser grade; and if I claim damage, that controversy is to be adjusted by some instrumentality set up by the exchange?

Mr. DIAL. Formerly it was adjusted by the exchange. The law, however, was changed. The law now provides that if the seller of the contract does not tender middling cotton but tenders some other grade, and he and the purchaser can not agree upon the price of that other grade, then they would submit the matter to the Secretary of Agriculture. That was flabbergast No. 3; that bothered me. I could not go back on the Secretary of Agriculture. So I thought "That is mighty nice," and I studied over it some. I am not very quick to anger, and so I endeavor to get my bearings on that proposition.

I thought the Secretary of Agriculture would fix the price, and that would be pretty good, for he would not be against us farmers. That, however, is not the law. The Secretary of Agriculture does not fix any price, but he merely ascertains what the price was in the markets. So he wires to 10 "spot" markets and finds out what the particular grade of cotton was bringing on that day. Then he adds up the prices quoted and divides them by 10 and says the result of that process is the price at which the contract must be settled for that other grade of cotton. There is no virtue in saying the Secretary of Agriculture should do that. I have no ill will against the Secretary of Agriculture; he is a fine gentleman, I think, but we had just as well say that the stenographer of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] could do that. The Secretary of Agriculture had no right to change the price; he merely ascertained what was the price in the "spot" market.

What I am quarreling about, if the ministers will excuse me—and I almost feel like swearing [laughter]—is that the cotton would have brought more if it had not been for the unjust contract. They auction the contracts off all the time; it is an auction proposition. The auctioneer asks, "What will you give me? Going, going, going!" That fixes the price for the poor devil out yonder plowing in the rain; and he is the man in whom I am interested. The injustice in the contract, the inequality in the contract, is what I am complaining about. I have no complaint about those who play the contract; that does not bother me at all, but I do say, and I ask Senators to remember—and this is the main burden of my song—that the spot cotton would bring a higher price if that contract did not control the price and were not on top of the price. If the contract could be separated from its effect on the spot cotton, I would not so much care. Then they could dance and sing and play and gamble and raise all the Cain they want to on the exchange.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. DIAL. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Whatever the form of the contract is, the exchange price will fix the price all over the South?

Mr. DIAL. Almost absolutely.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And the point of the Senator is that this form of contract tends unnaturally to depress the price all the time?

Mr. DIAL. Absolutely; because of the discrimination in the contract. Suppose I come to the Senator and say, "Senator HITCHCOCK, I hear you want to order an automobile," and you reply that you do, and I say, "Very well; I am selling them, and I have 10 grades of automobiles, and I have graduated prices." You reply. "Very well." I say, "I have them from a thousand dollars up to $10,000," and you reply, "Put me down for a certain-priced machine." Then I come back and say, "Senator, I have made up my mind to deliver your automobile, but I am going to deliver you a Ford," or, in your case, I would say, "I will deliver you a Rolls-Royce." You say, "Oh, no; I do not want that kind of an automobile; I want a Cadillac." But I say, "I am the seller, and under the cotton law I have the right to deliver any one of them to you." Would you give as much for a contract not knowing the kind of car that would be delivered?

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. DIAL. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. There is a provision in the law that if the seller agrees to deliver middling cotton, as it is called, and he does not deliver that cotton but delivers some other grade less valuable, then the Secretary of Agriculture may determine the difference between the grade delivered and the grade promised, and the buyer is required to pay that difference.

Mr. DIAL. Yes.

Mr. STANLEY. And the Secretary of Agriculture determines the difference by ascertaining the value of the spot cotton on that day?

Mr. DIAL. The price of that particular grade of spot cotton on that day; that is correct.

Mr. STANLEY. And that price is as much depressed as the price of the grade for which the contract calls?

Mr. DIAL. That is the idea exactly.

Mr. STANLEY. I do not know the terms, but, say, a man agrees to buy middling——

Mr. DIAL. There are low middlings and strict middlings, and so forth.

Mr. STANLEY. Then he agrees to buy middling——

Mr. DIAL. The purchase is made on the basis of middling. That fixes the price.

Mr. STANLEY. But the seller delivers low middling.

Mr. DIAL. He tells you he is going to deliver low middling.

Mr. STANLEY. Then the Secretary of Agriculture finds out the price——

Mr. DIAL. I will ask the Senator to wait a moment. Suppose I say "I am going to deliver to you low middling at, say, a cent less than middling," but the buyer says "No; I will not allow that." Then they can not agree.

Mr. STANLEY. I understand that; and in determining the actual loss the purchaser appeals to the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Agriculture finds the price of low middling by spot sales on that day.

Mr. DIAL. On 10 spot markets on that day; that is correct.

Mr. STANLEY. And the average price of the cotton thus ascertained on that day is the measure of the compensation?

Mr. DIAL. That is it; he takes that grade at that price.

Mr. STANLEY. But, as I understand the Senator, the standard by which the loss is measured is depressed by the same legislative machinery by which the price of the original article is depressed?

Mr. DIAL. Absolutely. The Senator has the proper idea.

Mr. STANLEY. That is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. DIAL. That is the idea. Here is the trouble about the proposition: There is no limit to the selling; exchanges are allowed to sell any quantity they want. Whoever can put up a margin may buy or sell. In 1920 we raised in the South a little less than thirteen and a half million bales of cotton, yet two exchanges alone sold almost nine times as much as was ever raised. There are exchanges also in Bremen, Liverpool, and other places in the world, and they buy and sell contracts, not to help the farmer sell cotton, but they buy these paper contracts; they affect our exchanges, and the price thus quoted affects the spot cotton in the State of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and the spot cotton in my State. That is what I am complaining about. Although I have not an amendment along that line, it seems to me there ought to be some limitation to the quantity that may be sold. The quantity of cotton that is sold is not in existence and will not be in existence in five years, perhaps, yet they keep on selling. Whoever can put up a margin and sell the longest is going to determine the way the price is going. I object to that. Before a seed is put in the ground the next crop is sold.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, at that point will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DIAL. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. I want to get the attention of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and also the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to this proposition. I am not a cotton expert; but following the interruption of the Senator from Utah and the statement of the Senator from South Carolina to the effect that the trouble is due to the unwarranted intermeddling in a contractual relation between people that have plenty of sense and technical knowledge of their own, and ability to attend to their own affairs, suppose the present law should be repealed; suppose the whole statute should be wiped out and men were allowed to make contracts to buy and sell cotton exactly as they make contracts to buy and sell the cloth made from the cotton or to buy and sell the land on which the cotton is raised or the mules that plow it, then if a man should agree to sell a certain grade of cotton he would either have to deliver it or go into a court and pay fair compensation?

Mr. DIAL. Absolutely. The Senator has come to the solution of the difficulty. In other words, I will say to the Senator from Kentucky, if our people had not inherited this situation and Congress should put it upon them, we would have a revolution if the people of the South understood it. I say, though, that I am glad Congress did take jurisdiction, and they passed the best law they could at that time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, is the Senator willing now that Congress shall repeal the existing law?

Mr. DIAL. I prefer to amend the existing law. I will come to that in a little bit. We appealed to Congress to take jurisdiction of the subject matter, and we are glad that they did; but the Congress was inimical, I imagine, to our section of the country, and our friends got this law through the best they could at that time. Then our friends thought that they would deal under section 10 and would specify the identical grade of the cotton at the time the contract was made, and that would be perfect. So far as I know, I would have no objection in the world to that, and that is what ought to be done; but the Yankees were too smart for us. They never have sold one of those contracts on the New York Exchange, and but very few on the New Orleans Exchange.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator if there are not two kinds of exchanges, those that deal in spot cotton and those that deal in futures? And if there are two kinds of exchanges, does the indictment which the Senator is making cover both kinds?

Mr. DIAL. We have only two main exchanges in the United States, one in New York and one in New Orleans. The others are mere branches, I think, of those exchanges.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that, for instance, the exchange in Little Rock, Ark., is a branch of the New Orleans or the New York Exchange, which deals in futures exclusively?

Mr. DIAL. No; I am not certain about the Little Rock one; but they have one in Memphis and one in Charleston, and I think they are merely agents, perhaps, of these others.

Mr. KING. Do they deal in futures?

Mr. DIAL. They deal in futures.

Mr. RANSDELL. Pardon me. The Senator does not mean that they sell future contracts, does he?

Mr. DIAL. Yes.

Mr. RANSDELL. There are only two exchanges in the country which deal in future contracts, and they are the New Orleans Exchange and the New York Exchange.

Mr. DIAL. Yes; but they have branches all over the country. They have branches here in Washington, and they have branches in Greenville, S. C., and they have branches all over the country. These two exchanges fix the price of cotton.

Mr. RANSDELL. They may possibly take orders. I suppose the Senator could take orders here for a firm in Paris, to buy cotton or anything else, but he would hardly call himself a branch of a Paris firm. All the exchanges in this country except New Orleans and New York are known as spot exchanges, and if they get an order from some of their customers for a future contract they certainly have to send it to New Orleans or to New York for execution. They could not execute it.

Mr. DIAL. Very well. I do not know of any exchange which makes a future contract for a specific grade of cotton. The figures show that New Orleans did make a few, but I am told by the Agricultural Department—and I investigated this thing thoroughly—that New York had never made a single future contract specifying any particular grade of cotton.

Mr. KING. But they deal in futures?

Mr. DIAL. They deal in futures. That is their business. They do not deal in anything else.

Mr. KING. Has not the Supreme Court of the United States held, with respect to those contracts which deal in futures, that they are unenforceable?

Mr. DIAL. No; they held just the other way.

Mr. KING. That they were gambling contracts?

Mr. DIAL. No. I never read one of these contracts; but I am told that you sign a statement that you are prepared to take the actual cotton, and the Supreme Court held that where that is the intention of the parties the contract is binding.

Mr. KING. Has not the Supreme Court of the United States held, with respect to some of these cotton contracts, that they are so speculative and partake so much of the element of gambling that they are not enforceable?

Mr. DIAL. I think they did some time ago; but later they amended the form of the contract, and if to-day you or I were to sign one of these contracts it would be in the contract that we expected to take the cotton. I do not know the wording of it exactly, but the idea is that they intend it as an actual transaction, to be delivered, and the Supreme Court held that it is valid.

Mr. KING. Is the Senator willing for these exchanges to sell cotton or contract to sell cotton that they do not have and can not deliver?

Mr. DIAL. I will come to that in a little bit.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the court has repeatedly held that this kind of contract is a species of gambling and is unenforceable.

Mr. DIAL. They have been recovering judgments on them.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have had cases of that kind and lost out on them—$26,000 in one case.

Mr. KING. Why do they not close up the exchanges if they are engaging in a species of gambling?

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what ought to be done.

Mr. DIAL. Anyway, I know there have been some decisions, and I think they have varied; but I think they amended the form of the contract later, and the court held that that would stand. They collected some debts, I know, in my State, and got judgment against the debtors where they sold out contracts and there was a deficiency in the contract.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. DIAL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to ask the Senator whether the Supreme Court did not hold that a contract which did not require specific performance in the delivery of the cotton contracted was unenforceable?

Mr. DIAL. That is correct. They held that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, did not the exchanges change the form of their contracts, and are they not now selling under a contract that does stipulate for the actual delivery of the cotton upon the demand of the buyer?

Mr. DIAL. That is my understanding; and the party has the right to get the actual cotton, to deliver the actual cotton. I think the courts have held that that is all right; that is a contract; but what I am kicking about is the indefiniteness in the contract.

Mr. SIMMONS. And under the contract the actual delivery of the cotton can be enforced?

Mr. DIAL. That is my understanding.
